This reform has done much good. Under many difficulties, in the face of much opposition, against many temptations, the civil service of the Federal Government at New York City has steadily improved under the present Administration in all its clerical and subordinate departments. There have been wrongs by special agents of the Treasury, there have been many evils of which I have spoken freely both here and elsewhere, and yet in the face of these things I am bound as matter of simple truth and justice to say that the morale and efficiency of the customs and postal service at the cities of New York and Brooklyn have steadily improved under the operation of the "civil-service reform."

If the effort has not been altogether a success, still it has not been altogether a sham or a failure. We have assumed the responsibility of attempting this reform. We must make it a success or accept for ourselves and our party the responsibility of the failure. We have the power; ours then is the duty. We cannot deceive the people. Do not let us try to do so, even if we can.

Let us vote this appropriation. Then, instead of secretly opposing and hindering, let us help by sincere effort and friendliest advice to make the experiment each year more practical and more efficient. In one word, let us each in his own district and in his own place of power or trust squarely live up to this reform ourselves, and so help our President and all the heads of Departments to enforce it to the welfare of the public service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. In 1871, as I understand, this civil-service commission was established. It was the insignia on the republican flag in the campaign of 1872 that the party had attempted to reform itself. It was the boast and the pride of stump orators during that campaign, and at the hustings we heard the fair pledges of thorough and sweeping reform.

In 1871, $10,000 I believe was voted to pay the expenses of this commission; in 1872, $25,000; and in 1873, $25,000 more. And this civil-service reform was thus built up in theory, but in practice there have been no real reformatory results. The same "spoils of office" that were so much deprecated still exist in all their colossal proportions. Although in 1871 this began under what were claimed and considered to be such favorable auspices, yet in the campaign of 1872, right in the city of Washington, notwithstanding that the civil-service rules prescribed that there should be no assessments upon clerks in the Departments or elsewhere, the agent of the national republican committee went into the Post-Office Department and there solicited and obtained, under the eye of the officers of that Department, subscriptions from the clerks. This was done not only here but in other cities throughout the country, reaching Chicago and other points. So much a failure was the civil-service reform in practice, that the chairman of the commission, Hon. George W. Curtis, appointed by the President himself, was compelled by a sense of honor and a sense of justice to himself to resign his commission. This he did in the spring or summer of 1873 because of the open and reckless violation of the rules prescribed by that commission. We have merely a theory for which a large appropriation is made year by year, while the practical results are barren of good, and the system establishes nothing but the fact of simulation.

A hundred millions or more of the revenues of the country are lost annually in the collection, as is stated by the civil-service commission. The major part of this, too, is in consequence of fraud or inefficiency. We lose year by year in this manner that enormous amount of money, and yet we are asked by the Secretary of the Treasury this year to increase the burdens of the people $42,000,000 by additional taxation. This, stripped of all paraphernalia, is the vaunted reform. We have attempted to obtain practical results, and there has been built up instead simply a theory. If the civil-service report of this year be examined, you will find that it amounts simply to this one thing—no abolition of party favoritism, but ample latitude is claimed for its efficient exercise. Members of Congress are besieged by applicants for positions whom they do not care to meet by a refusal, and they are remitted to the civil-service rules. In that way the rules are a convenience. But if they see any positions that are desirable and wish their friends to fill them, that way is practically open, notwithstanding these civil-service rules. The customs department itself, to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] has referred, and which needs reforming much more perhaps than any other branch of the civil service, is not under the control of these rules and regulations; or at least they are not put in practice there to any troublesome extent.

The theory I say of these regulations is that there shall be a genuine reform—that there shall be no political preferences, and that there shall be a simple rule which shall govern all cases upon a testing examination. But to obtain an indorsement of these rules by Congress, and to continue the system in existence, the committee put it so gingerly in their last report that it is easy to perceive full scope is left for party patronage. That the system might meet with the approval of the republican members of Congress and obtain their support, these rules are held to be so flexible that all the needed patronage and party spoils might still be secured. That is the fair interpretation of it.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out the two last words. I desire, Mr. Chairman, in all honesty and sincerity to discuss the question as presented by the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform. I understand that he did me the favor to allude to me in connection with the resolution which was passed in the committee in favor of this amendment. I was absent through sickness for one week, and in that week that resolution was adopted.

Mr. KELLOGG. The miscellaneous appropriation bill was about to be taken up, and if we were to do anything we had to do it at once. We were sorry that it had to be taken up during the absence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but we could not help it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Of course it only happened so. Now, my friend is entirely mistaken in saying that this system of civil-service reform originated in the recommendation of the President of the United States. It never entered into his wildest imagination. Where, then, did it come from? The bill was passed on the 3d of March, 1871, when the President had been in office some considerable time. Who started it? It was when there was a cabal in the Senate of the United States composed of Senators Trumbull, SCHURZ, and others for the purpose of breaking down the President of the United States in the next coming election of 1872. They looked around for means to do it, and Mr. Trumbull offered as an amendment to the light-house bill this very luminous proposition for civil-service reform, for the purpose of catching the republican party. And we here were bothered at that time with the same sort of demagogues we see at some other times, and we did not dare to vote against it in this House. It was a catch-word. Everybody was afraid to go home and state that he had dared to vote against civil-service reform, which had its origin in China and its best exemplification in Great Britain.

They have had it for a long, long time in China, and China has got on much better than we have, so that I suppose we ought to adopt the customs of the Mongolian race. Sir, it is a mere trick of a politician who had apostatized from his party, and knowing that he was dead on account of his vote on Andrew Johnson's impeachment, he tried once more to get himself alive; but this scheme did not breathe the breath of life into him or galvanize him back again into public life.

Now I am telling what you all know. What happened next? Thereupon the President, having this measure forced on him by Congress, did the best he could, and said that he would try what he could do. He appointed a set of commissioners who made certain rules which the President himself was obliged to violate at once in all matters relating to the higher appointments, simply because they were all unconstitutional; for it is the Senate that must confirm his appointments and not a body of examiners. Now these rules not only extended to ascertaining the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service he ought to enter, but here was an attempt to say that there should be no promotions——

Mr. KELLOGG. Those are the old rules.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am speaking of the old rules, the rules made under that law, and they were found entirely impracticable. If you are to have promotion now, how are you to get that promotion? Simply under the rules by examination. What did they do? Why, the first thing was that they violated a law of Congress which was not only passed for our own guidance but for the guidance of other persons. I ask the Clerk to read the joint resolution of March 3, 1865.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointment to civil offices, provided they shall be found to possess the business capacity necessary for the purpose of discharging the duties of such offices.

Resolved, second, That in grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the country by reason of wounds or disease or the expiration of terms of enlistment, it is respectfully recommended to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and persons engaged in industrial pursuits to give them preference for appointments to remunerative situations and employment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. So that it seems we not only passed a law by which in the Departments of the Government honorably discharged and disabled soldiers should have places, but we recommended to all persons and parties everywhere that they should give preference to such disabled soldiers.

Mr. MAYNARD. Was not the subsequent act establishing what is called the civil-service reform a repeal pro tanto of the preceding act of 1865, which the gentleman has had read?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; no, sir. I am going right on with that, for that is one of my troubles with the civil-service reform. That law required that they should ascertain the efficiency of candidates, and then they made rules that any man who could answer certain questions in arithmetic, geography, astronomy, philosophy, technology, and history should be entitled to places.

Mr. McNULTA obtained the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. WOODFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed time to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. No such unanimous consent can be given in committee.

Mr. McNULTA. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I yield for that purpose to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose to oppose the amendment. I was about to say that answers upon all these points which I had named were to be put above blood and wounds and honorable service in the field, so that if a man had only been, what they called down South in more expressive language than we at the North used, in a bomb-proof situation during the war, and had studied in a college while his brother went into the service in the field, he would have the preference over that brother, who came back perhaps with one arm, in obtaining employment in the civil service. Now, I ask if those rules have been so construed as to repeal that law? I brought that very case up before the Treasury Department. A man with a bullet in his body, got in a charge upon a fortified place, passed at 76, where efficiency was at 70. But he was forced to stand back, and has gone home now, and is asking his friends to support him in his wounded condition, while a young man who was at the academy all that time has taken his place. That is what I object to in this civil-service reform.

And not only that; it puts the whole civil service of the country on an entirely wrong footing. It puts in the hands of three or four examiners the power to determine who shall be appointed. How do I know that? They say that they will determine exactly and fairly. Now let me tell you what happened in the Interior Department. A clerk in that Department, more or less honest, stole the list of questions and sold them to four applicants, who studied them up and got them perfectly, so that when they came to answer them they had them correctly. They answered every question rightly. And yet, standing wholly upon questions and answers, they did not pass so high as some men who did not have the list of questions and did not answer them all fully. Why? Because they were not the favorites of the examining board. And the Congress of the United States is asked to lay down the people's power, which has been given to us in the way of recommending men to positions, and to put that power in the hands of three sub-clerks, who travel around the country in first-class cars, each one taking a whole section to sleep in, while I, on my salary, have to get along with a berth. They also charge all their expenses to Government account, take a section each of a sleeping-car, so that they may have room enough for their brains to expand and enable them to get these questions properly prepared.

Let me say one word further about this civil-service reform. In the Departments here there are from the District of Columbia alone six hundred and seventeen clerks, with salaries from $1,200 to $1,800 a year. They are there from this District alone, where you do not collect a dollar's worth of taxes and where the United States is every day called upon in some form or other to appropriate money to assist to support them. Yet there are other districts in this country, like the one of my friend whose time I am speaking in, which pay millions upon millions of taxes, and which have not a clerk in the Departments here, and cannot get one.

Mr. COX. I do not antagonize this amendment exactly. Perhaps I may have to move an amendment in order to have an opportunity to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is now in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He has well discussed the practice under this civil-service reform. He has indicted his own administration, at the same time that he has defended the head of that Administration against the Philadelphia platform and the action of Congress. I do not know now who is responsible for this particular conduct about civil-service reform. I only know you have authorized the appointment of commissioners, some of whom act and some of whom resign; but when you come to real practical reform it is not there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is so.

Mr. SENER. There is nothing in it.

Mr. COX. I do not know but my friend from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] may be able to make some little reforms here and there.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am doing the best I can.

Mr. COX. It reminds me of the French comedy of Madame Benoiton. The one giving the name to the comedy never appears upon the stage at all, but everybody who comes before the curtain inquires very particularly for her.

The civil-service reform is a humbug of the Administration, and I am glad the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] with his trenchant spear has pricked the bubble. Why has not there been reform in other matters besides the appointment of a few clerks here in Washington? Why do you not bring forward here something to reform the collection of your internal revenue? I could refer to facts now before me to show how utterly incompetent your men are in the internal-revenue service, and how utterly bad the internal-revenue service is in that respect. The Internal Revenue Bureau needs to be reorganized. Why do you not bring forward something that will accomplish that much-needed reform? Special allowances should be abolished. Why do you not abolish them? Some restraint should be imposed upon the employment of clerks. Why do you not propose a reform in that regard? Favoritism should be abolished. Why do you not break up that system of favoritism, which you say your civil-service reform was intended to do away with?

Neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should be allowed arbitrarily to fix salaries; yet the Bureau allowances always get through here. How much of the cost of collection of internal revenue inheres to the Bureau here and how much to the collection of internal taxes? Let your Committee on Ways and Means finish their work if they have any work to do in that respect and reorganize economically and equally the cost of official work and the cost of collection.

I could show this House that it costs in some of the internal-revenue districts of the United States more to collect the revenue than the amount collected. The cost of all collections for the year 1872 was 3.98 per cent. of the amount collected, and for the year 1873 it was 4.1 per cent. The amount collected in 1872 was $105,238,480; in 1873, $117,329,127. The office expenses for 1873 were in excess of those for 1872. In 1873 the following extraordinary percentages were paid, according to States and Territories: In Arizona, 62¾ per cent.; in Dakota, 90⅝ per cent.; in Maine, 15.1 per cent.; in Mississippi, 40.9 per cent.; in North Carolina, 10.1 per cent.; in Oregon, 18¾ per cent.; in South Carolina, 21½ per cent.; in Tennessee, 17½ per cent., and so on. So that it will appear, when complaint is made of the East, that whereas in the State of New York it costs 3 per cent. to collect, or over 1 per cent. below the average, and in Ohio it is more than 2 per cent. below, and in Maryland and Michigan it is about the same as the average, while in Delaware, Indiana, and Illinois it is much below. The extraordinary cost of collecting the revenue is far above the average in many of the States.

I have several tables which show the discrepancies in the collection. They are taken from a public document. I read them from the New York Tribune, January 2, 1874. In some of these districts the cost has exceeded the collections, as in the seventh district of North Carolina, which cost 102½ per cent., in Wyoming 102¾, and in Dakota 110 per cent.

How does all this happen? Why has there been no attempt made by the Committee on Ways and Means or by this House to make any equalization in this regard? Why have we no reform in this particular?

Mr. MAYNARD. Has the gentleman any table showing the amount of tax collected together with the expense of the collection?

Mr. COX. I have; the statement to which I have just been referring was made up from such a table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will give that table in full in his remarks.

Mr. COX. I will do so.

Mr. MAYNARD. It would be very instructive.

Mr. COX. Gentlemen need instruction on this subject; and I especially commend this table to the gentleman from Tennessee, whose State is perhaps more derelict in this particular than any other.

The following is the table referred to.

The following tables show the amount of internal revenue collected in each district in the United States, the cost of collection, and the rate per cent. which the cost of collection makes of the whole amount. An examination of the last column will show that the percentage was increased last year over what it was the year before, while on account of the simplification of the work of the office and the more general use of stamps it should have been reduced:

I should like to see a higher standard of official qualification. I should like to see better officers in every department of the Government; even better Congressmen. I wish I were more fit myself. I should like to see men on both sides of this Chamber a little more attentive to business, and a little more studious, though in that respect I cannot complain of my friend from Tennessee. I should like to see our President, and all the heads of Departments, good business men, as well as men of integrity. That is what the people want. The true idea of civil-service reform is honesty and capacity.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, the fate of this measure is clearly foreshadowed by the temper of the House. Yet it is quite evident from the remarks of every gentleman who has spoken that a reform of some description in the civil service of this Government is necessary. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] showed very clearly that the Departments have not lived up to their own good professions and to the wise legislation of Congress. The remarks of the two gentlemen from New York on my left, [Mr. CREAMER and Mr. COX,] though exaggerating the evils of which they spoke, show plainly that there are abuses.

Now, what do we mean by civil-service reform? Not any one set of phrases or regulations. We mean a steady spirit and purpose to make a better civil service, to correct acknowledged evils, to protect acknowledged improvements. If our present civil-service commissioners are not the most capable men we can get, let them be turned out and others put in their places. If their system is not the best that can be devised, point out its errors and improve that system. But instead of that, the evident disposition here is to whistle the whole affair down the wind, to sneer at the phrase "civil-service reform," to refuse any appropriation for carrying it on, to abandon the whole measure. And what next? Shall we return to the spoils system in all its deformity and infamy? Will any man avow that design? Will any man say that upon the incoming of the next administration, if it should be a democratic administration, there ought to be a wholesale turning out of public servants of all classes and the putting in of new men, so that partisans might be rewarded for their party services? Is that the avowed purpose of either party? Is there any party that dares to emblazon such principles and purposes upon its banner and fight for them in the next campaign? There is no man here who, as a delegate to the next national convention of either party and a member on the committee on resolutions, would hesitate, in spite of your sneers to-day, to put into the platform of his party some such a declaration as this adopted by the republican national convention in 1872:

> Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage, and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life-tenure of office.

Such in substance were the declarations of both parties in 1872. Both parties would make such declarations again to-day in their platforms. And when you go upon the stump you declare that the qualifications required of a candidate for office are honesty, efficiency, and fidelity; that you want such men only appointed as will pass these tests; that you want such men retained, and such only. Yet though we have had an able commission, doing their best to devise and perfect a good system of civil service, gentlemen in this House are ready to sneer at every effort in that direction and to refuse to vote money to carry on the labor.

I tell you, gentlemen, I have heretofore seen this House in a temper like this on an important subject; and I have seen it repent within six months and take the back track. I tell you, gentlemen of both parties, that if you undertake to trample this system under foot you will be sorry for it. The people of this country are determined upon a more faithful and efficient administration of the civil service, and I do not care what man, from President Grant and his Cabinet down through both Houses of Congress, may undertake to oppose this resolve of the people, he must walk the plank. No man can be sustained before the people who undertakes to maintain that party zeal and party service are to be the only or the highest test for official appointment.

Men in the past have undertaken to introduce into our official administration what Clay has denominated a "detestable system, grown from the worst periods of the Roman republic." The worst men become the most clamorous for place and the most successful. The legislative department, usurping the functions of the executive, demanded the control of patronage. Under such a system no public officer, however faithful, knew from day to day how long he would continue in the public service, how soon he might be turned out to give place to some zealous partisan. He looked upon every associate as a possible spy. The appointing power felt at liberty at any time to make changes if more power was to be gained by the change or a more influential politician to be pleased, the object being not merely party strength even, but individual gain.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] in what he said, not only to-day but last year when he announced that this experiment had proved to be a humbug. That I believe was the expression—not very elegant, but very forcible. Sir, by this civil-service commission and the system which has been provided under it you are utterly unable to reach anybody except the lowest grades of clerks and employés. The Constitution of the United States provides that the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

That is a fixed, unalterable constitutional limitation. You cannot, therefore, reach anybody who has any real authority or responsibility for their acts by this civil-service commission. You only reach the subordinates, and relieve those who are responsible by enabling them to say those who prove derelict or incompetent even imposed upon them against their will.

What is the effect? Why, sir, the heads of the Departments are appointed in spite of your civil-service commission; their fitness or unfitness cannot be inquired into. All the men who are responsible to Congress and to the country are put and kept in their places in spite of it. When we come to investigate the conduct of subordinates for violations of law and seek to hold the heads of Bureaus and Departments responsible, the excuses are made by the chiefs, to whom alone we look, that these people were put there against their will, against their consent, and that they are not amenable for their misconduct, and the excuse is often reasonable and just.

I say as long as we continue to vest any commission with the power of appointing officers in spite of the President and heads of Departments they cannot be held responsible for these subordinates, so that there is no responsibility. The examiners are of course irresponsible. Besides that, the rules we have established have been so manipulated, as every man knows, so as to make appointments as strictly partisan as they were or could be made under the old system. Who ever heard of a democrat getting an office? I hope no democrat ever applied; certainly none ever obtained one, and none ever will so long as the present party remains in power. They will always find excuses of some sort to keep them out, no matter how much more competent than their republican competitors they may be. It is folly, often worse than folly, to test competency or efficiency by mere capacity to answer questions in grammar or arithmetic. Take, for instance, the men who are engaged in the life-saving stations along our coast. They are men who have been trained for years in that service until they have attained the utmost efficiency; they can man their boats, brave the storms, and save the lives of human beings in the midst of tempests. If these men are required to go before the civil-service commission to come into competition with school-masters who may not have the courage to go within a hundred feet of a wave nor the slightest qualification for that special service, yet because he knows something about geography and something about spelling the schoolmaster will get the place to the exclusion of those who are efficient and capable to do this particular duty. I have a son not yet eighteen years of age, fresh from school—indeed there now—who can go before any civil-service commission and get any place under the rules which have been established in competition with me, which he is not competent to fill and which I am, because he can answer all the questions the examiners can ask while I could not answer half of them perhaps. Doubtless that would be the case with the sons of most members on this floor.

Sir, the only sensible rule is to let the President and the heads of the Departments appoint their subordinates, as the Constitution provides, and hold them responsible for their fidelity and good conduct. Let them fill the places with or without the consent of members of Congress, or against their consent if they see fit. Let them put men there they can rely on, and for whose acts they can be held answerable to Congress and the country.

The practical operation of the system has been simply to relieve heads of Departments from responsibility for the misconduct of their officers. It never has done any good to the Government or the people. I am tired of it, and will be glad to see the power of appointment restored to the President and heads of Departments as it was formerly. I want no middle-men, no go-betweens, no old fossils, ignorant of the services required or the qualifications demanded to determine what pet of theirs shall fill positions of honor, profit, or trust. They are humbugs, and the system is worse than that; it is one which deprives Congress of power to punish negligence and guilt, by affording a shelter to those in authority. I in common with many good men of both parties thought at first it would work well; it has, as administered, proved to be a miserable failure.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the committee rise. I am, however, quite willing to go on if that be the sense of the House.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 78.

Mr. RANDALL demanded tellers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish, if possible, to avoid a night session.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has already divided on the motion, and there were—ayes 74, noes 78.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POTTER. I decline to speak on the question at this time in view of the temper of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to its being withdrawn.

The question being taken on Mr. BECK'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Now, I desire to inquire of the republican party if there is one single principle in the platform put forth by the republican party when General Grant was elected for the second term which they propose to stand by?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; we stand by our soldiers.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Yes; we stand by the soldiers. But the convention which nominated General Grant—not Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois; not Mr. SCHURZ, of Missouri; not any liberal republican, but the convention which nominated General Grant—in which every district in the United States was represented by its chosen representative, adopted this resolution as a part of their platform:

> Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing; and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity essential qualifications for public positions without practically creating a life tenure of office.

Mr. Chairman, upon that the republican party went to the country. A similar resolution was adopted by the liberal party. A similar resolution was adopted by the national democratic convention. A similar resolution was adopted by the national labor convention. In fact, sir, every political party that assembled in that year as a national organization adopted this declaration that there was absolutely needed a thorough reform of the civil service. And the President in pursuance of the opinion of the country thus expressed—not the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Missouri, but the President of the United States—took steps to create a commission, seeking through that commission to make honesty, efficiency, and integrity a leading and chief characteristic for which the man was to be recommended for position under the Government. And now, sir, leading and influential men in the republican party denounce it and say that it is hostile to their party organization.

I ask again if there is any principle in the platforms the republican party have hitherto adopted which they are prepared to stand by, and I ask still further if as a party they propose to play fast and loose with the people in this way, if they propose to keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope? If after having come into office on the platform and under the banner of civil-service reform they will now spit upon that platform and trample that banner under foot, how long, I ask, should such a party remain in power?

Mr. RANDALL. Not a day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question?

Mr. MARSHALL. I prefer to go on, as I have only a few moments.

Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore voted for appropriations for the purpose of establishing and maintaining this board for regulating the civil service. I shall vote no longer for keeping up this most wretched and expensive sham and most miserable fraud on the people. It has accomplished no valuable purpose, performed nothing whatever, and has been used simply as a means of deluding the people with the hope of reform, while every species of fraud and peculation have been practiced upon them. To adopt the quotation of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] used by him for another purpose, it has but kept the word of promise to the ear while breaking it to our hopes.

Where has there been any reform in the civil service during the last three years, since the time when this board was first established? During its existence fraud and corruption have festered in every branch of the civil service. There is no time in the history of our Republic when fraud and violation of the law have been so rampant as during the last three years. Civil-service reform! Why, have not the henchmen of the Administration invaded the States for the purpose of controlling their elections during this time? Has it not been during this time that the Sanborn frauds and moiety swindles have been perpetrated on the country; that Federal officers have revolutionized States and trampled their rights under their unhallowed feet; that hundreds of men have been placed on the pay-rolls in the city of Washington and elsewhere without performing one hour's service for the country? Only the other day the new Secretary of the Treasury struck from the rolls a whole horde of pensioned henchmen who have been drawing pay regularly from the Treasury while they remained at home, not performing one moment's service for the country. The Commissioner of Pensions a short time ago, in making a defense of himself against charges of frauds and violations of law, admitted that he had kept men for years on the pay-rolls of his Bureau who had not been called upon and were not expected to give one moment's service to the Government—mere pensioned vagabonds or tools of those in power; thus by open robbery swallowing up the moneys wrung from the hard earnings of an overburdened and oppressed people, and all this done immediately under the eyes of the President and of this board established for the ostensible purpose of reforming our civil service.

Sir, it is unquestionably true that the people are demanding reform in the civil service. They are determined to have it. But it is as clear as sunlight that there is but one mode of reaching it. The Constitution has placed in the hands of the Executive the power and the duty of taking care of the honor and treasure of the country and the purity of the civil service. That power is there, and you cannot take it from him by any legislative enactments or so-called civil-service rules. They all amount to nothing more than a delusion and a snare to the people. I am no longer in favor of voting the people's money to keep up this useless board as a mere scape-goat on which to cast the sins of the Administration. There is but one way to remedy the evils of the civil service. The President must feel it his duty as sensitively as he guards his own honor to preserve the honor of the Republic and the rights and the money of the people. And if you have not a man in the executive chair who has that feeling, and will, sagacity, and determination to give effect to it, you may pass all the laws you please and have all the bureaus and boards on earth without accomplishing any good. You must place the responsibility where it is placed by the Constitution. The people have elected a Chief Magistrate and placed in his hands the power and the duty of maintaining and preserving the honor of the country, the revenues of the people, and the purity of the civil service. It is mere folly to attempt by shams to shift this responsibility. If he fails in the discharge of this high duty, let him be held to a strict accountability.

This failure is so gross and so palpable as to cry to the very heavens for a change. The jugglery of boards of reform will no longer delude the people. The only road to reform is by an entire change of the Administration. Put a man at the helm who feels what is due to the honor of the Republic, and who will exercise the powers vested in his hands by the Constitution to drive from place and power all the thieves, and robbers, and peculators, and incapables, and deadbeats who are now disgracing our country and eating out the substance of the people.

The people now demand this reform. In the language of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] "they are determined to have it," and they will have it in that way—the only way in which the Constitution places the power in their hands to attain it. Sir, I am most decidedly in favor of this reform. But I am not in favor of this sham, this cheat, this fraud, this delusion, by which I will not say you kept up a board of dead-beats, living luxuriously and rioting at the expense of the people, for I desire to treat these gentlemen respectfully; but I say that their services to the country have been no more valuable than if they had been a set of miserable dead-beats. I say this with all respect to the most excellent gentlemen who have been employed in this service. You may place the very best and ablest men in the country in the same position, and the result would be precisely the same. Without the efficient and enlightened support and co-operation of the Chief Magistrate their rules and examinations are little better than a farce; with an efficient Chief Magistrate their services would be unnecessary. I repeat, there is but one mode of securing this reform, and that is through the presidential office, and I fear that it never will be fully reached and made permanent and secure until a reform is made in the mode of selecting that high functionary. The Chief Magistrate should, as I think, be merely the executor of the laws, and not the head of a political party. But I cannot enter upon that subject at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the committee to close debate upon this question; but I would be glad to be permitted to say what will take me two or three minutes before the debate closes. I ask if there is any objection to closing the debate at the end of three minutes?

Mr. NIBLACK. I want to be heard a little about this matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. And I desire to be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will gentlemen then agree to close debate in eight minutes?

Mr. NIBLACK. I have no objection if I get my five minutes.

Mr. POTTER. And I want the other three minutes because I gave up my time before.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will gentlemen then agree to eleven minutes, and let me have the remaining three minutes?

Several members objected.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of moving to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, and pending that motion I move that all debate on the amendment pending and the amendments thereto and upon the subject-matter embraced therein be closed in fifteen minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules so as to make it in order to move as an amendment to the bill pending in Committee of the Whole to cover into the Treasury any money which is now unexpended appropriated for civil-service reform, so called.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that motion to be made?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield for that motion. I want this matter to be done to death or provided for.

Mr. KELLOGG. This is a fair test; let us settle the motion now.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the question to suspend the rules.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the motion.

The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion to close debate.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Pending that motion I move that the House do now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873;

An act (H. R. No. 2879) revising and embodying all the laws authorizing post-roads in force on the 1st day of December, 1873; and

An act (H. R. No. 3349) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, relating to the District of Columbia, in force on the 1st day of December in the year of our Lord 1873.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 142) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. E. R. HOAR, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey: The petition of 230 workmen in the Cumberland Nail and Iron Company's Mills, at Bridgeton, New Jersey, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty on iron and steel, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MCJUNKIN: The petition of citizens of Apollo, Armstrong County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of the Union Mutual Insurance Company, of Philadelphia; of the Insurance Company of the State of Pennsylvania; and of the Insurance Company of North America, claiming to be subrogated and paid for the losses paid by them, presented to the Geneva arbitrators and allowed in their award; and asserting that they benefited commerce during the war, aided to sustain the Government, and that the national honor demands that they should be indemnified, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NEAL: The petition of S. O. Barker, administrator, for payment of bounty money due John H. Henderson, deceased, formerly of Company E, Twenty-third Regiment United States Colored Troops, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of citizens of Evansville, Indiana, protesting against the renewal of sewing-machine letters-patent, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. RUSK: The petition of James E. Audenried, late first lieutenant Company E, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, for arrears of pension from September 17, 1864, to May 13, 1870, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions

By Mr. SPEER: The petition of workingmen of Rebecca Furnace and Mines, Blair County, Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty on iron and steel and for free banking, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 12, 1874.

The Senate met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a memorial of workingmen engaged in the iron business, adopted at a mass meeting held at Columbia, Pennsylvania, June 10, 1874, in which they pray that Congress will not adjourn without taking decided action on the future financial policy of the country, and without restoring the 10 per cent. taken off certain duties in 1872. They also present certain charges and specifications against both political parties on their financial and economical doctrines, and suggest a financial policy which they pray may be adopted. I move the reference, of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a similar memorial of workingmen in the Rodman furnaces, Blair County, Pennsylvania, in which they pray for the adoption of free banking as substantially provided for in the bill presented by the House Committee on Banking and Currency, now pending, and for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duties taken off in 1872. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of the officers and stockholders of the Farmers' National Bank of Greensburgh, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of an act authorizing them to change the location and name of the bank; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the memorial of William S. Charnley, and others, bankers, manufacturers, and importers, citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, protesting against a tax on sales of stocks, coin, bonds, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of W. P. Adair, Cherokee delegate and representative of the New York Indians, protesting against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3352) to further provide for the sale of certain Indian lands in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PRATT presented the memorialof the Seneca Nation of Indians, paying that pensions may be allowed to the survivors who served the United States in the war of 1812 against Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Isaac L. Jackson, asking an appropriation for the use of his patent improvement in composition for printers' inking rollers by the Public Printer; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURN presented a memorial of merchants, importers, bankers, and business men of the city of Boston, protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill which imposes a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST. I present a petition from several commissioners of the State of Louisiana, praying congressional aid for the reconstruction of the levees of the Mississippi Valley. As this petition is rather lengthy, and contains a good deal of valuable information, I beg to present it and have it referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, and also printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The petition was referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River. It is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

The undersigned, accredited to your honorable bodies by the governor of Louisiana, the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, the Cotton Exchange, and the general relief committee, in the interest of a more secure levee protection against wasting overflows of the great delta of the Mississippi River, and not unmindful of the varied interests of the nation now absorbing every moment of your time in these last days of your session, beg to invoke your favorable and prompt action in a matter involving the welfare if not the existence of Louisiana as a State.

The protective system of levees adopted by the State previous to 1860 was being rapidly carried forward when interrupted by war; no part of the South promised quicker development or greater prosperity than did the alluvial lands of the Mississippi River at that time.

Our levee commissioners drew against funds from the sale of swamp lands granted by Congress and collected from tax on lands protected, (then of high value,) and labor could be had in any required amount at all times of danger from high water.

No people in the world ever labored harder or with greater sacrifices than ours of Louisiana since 1865, when war had ended. In the "new departure" at that period from old ways, we had hope and plenty of courage to try. The whole people of the State gave themselves up to taxation to save the lowlands, but all to no purpose. Year after year these lands, from repeated disasters, became less and less desirable, more and more unsafe, and now have but a nominal market value on account of the great flood which, sweeping down miles of levees, desolated the valley, and leaves its inhabitants dependent upon the bounty of the nation for daily food.

With capacity to grow a larger amount of the staple crops of cotton, sugar, and rice than is now produced in all the States of the South, we present this delta country to you as rapidly lapsing into the wilderness from which we had measurably redeemed it, and are obliged to say that Louisiana, with its hill country impoverished, its lowlands inundated and almost valueless, is unable to even stay this retrogradation by repair of its broken levees, and we do appeal to you with that earnestness which only despair of other help can give to consider the extremity of our people's condition. We cannot and will not believe that a great government like that you represent, made by the people for the good of all its people, which sends costly expeditions to all parts of the world in the interests of humanity, of science, of commerce, and of trade, will, after acquiring so rich a domain, see it depopulated, its inhabitants driven out and pauperized by floods poured upon them from the watershed of half the territory of the United States; and yet this is the certain result unless Congress, the only power to which we can look, shall quickly intervene, and grant a sum of money sufficient to at least fill up the crevasses in our line of levees.

We cannot believe that a Congress which has so promptly responded to the calls of a Christian duty toward the seventy thousand people who are to-day being fed from its gratuities, will hesitate a moment in the discharge of what we think even a higher duty, to save these same people from returning calamities, and this rich and extensive country from the swamps of a hundred years ago. Protected as it could be without greatly taxing the Treasury of the nation, this valley alone would give in profits to the manufacturers and producers outside of it, and in moneys saved from exportation and by taxes, more than is now realized from the foreign trade and commerce carried on with all other continental States of America. Filled up as it would be by a population to which it is extremely well suited, this valley of the Mississippi, if made safe to labor, would be the great home of the black man, whose every want of trade would be supplied from without, and every surplus dollar expended in that way. With homes, and in associations and under circumstances most congenial to themselves, this race would then develop out on these rich lands to the greatest measure of their capacity.

It surely cannot be that a state of things can be allowed which has been, and will be again, when, from the center of the Republic at Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico at the South, not a railway train, a horseman, or a footman, could pass from the hills of the east to those of the western side of the Mississippi Valley; not a letter even be conveyed, unless sent by trade boats from tributary rivers, the "dug-out" of the Indian, or some like primitive contrivance.

It does seem to your memorialists that a country to be great and prosperous must possess, in the basis of its structure, the power to protect all its people against whatever may be beyond their own control, dangerous to their lives and liberties, or destructive of material prosperity, and do entreat for such aid as a parental government may, in the wisdom of its legislators, grant in the premises.

Our State engineers estimate that it will take three million cubic yards of earth to repair the broken levees in Louisiana, one million in Mississippi, and one million in Arkansas, at places requiring a height of from eight to twenty-five feet, costing about $3,000,000.

An appropriation by Congress of $2,000,000, to be expended under direction of the Secretary of War, with what these States might be able to do, would close all crevasses before another season of high water.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

JOHN M. SANDIDGE,
On behalf of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, the Cotton Exchange, and General Relief Committee.
JAMES LONGSTREET,
P. O. HEBERT,
Commissioners of Levee Engineers.
M. JEFF. THOMPSON,
Chief State Engineer.
GEORGE F. SHERMAN,
Commissioner appointed by the Governor of Louisiana.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., June 12, 1874.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of manufacturers of cigars and dealers in manufactured tobacco, of Mansfield, Ohio, protesting against the passage of the law permitting growers of leaf-tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of workingmen, dependent upon the iron business for employment, adopted at a mass meeting held at Columbia, Pennsylvania, June 10, 1874, praying that Congress will not adjourn without taking decided action on the future financial policy of the country and without restoring the 10 per cent. duties taken off in 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of merchants, importers, bankers, and business men of the city of Albany, New York, protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill, which imposes a tax of $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCCREERY presented a memorial of citizens of Louisville, Kentucky, protesting against the passage of a law permitting growers of leaf-tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have a communication from the Librarian in regard to an amendment which has been recommended by the Committee on the Library to the sundry civil appropriation bill, for the purpose of preparing an index of the public documents and other publications of Congress. I move that the letter and the memoranda which explain the systen upon which it can be executed be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I ask for an order from the Senate directing the printing of a document which I hold in my hand. I will proceed to explain what it is. It is a communication from the superintendent of railway mail service, explaining the differences between the railway companies and the Post-Office Department with reference to transportation. I think it desirable that on the discussion of the post-office appropriation bill, which is likely to come up at an early day, every Senator should have a copy of this communication before him for his information. I move that the requisite number of copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2046) to amend the sixty-third, eightieth, eighty-first, eighty-second, eighty-third, eighty-fourth, and eighty-sixth sections of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, fixing and prescribing the method for adjusting the salaries of postmasters, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am also directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3603) to amend sections 245, 246, 247, and 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, to report the same back with amendments and recommend its passage. In this connection, as it is important, indeed absolutely necessary, that this bill should pass before the adjournment, and as I see no possibility of securing that unless the Senate agree to give us some hour of this session, say on Tuesday next, after the morning hour, for our bills, I ask that it be done. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent on Tuesday next, after the expiration of the morning hour, to proceed to the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

Mr. RAMSEY. The bill just reported is a bill relating to contracts with the Post-Office Department. At present, if any of the bidders fail to execute their contracts, there is no ability in the Postmaster-General to provide for temporary service.

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to except the appropriation bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to make an exception in favor of all bills from the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There seems to be objection.

Mr. RAMSEY. I call the Senate's attention to it; that is all.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 862) granting a pension to Margaret S. Hastings, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Rosa V. Jeffrey, late Johnson, and the children of Claude W. Johnson, of Lexington, Kentucky, praying for compensation for cotton seized and sold from her plantation in Tensas Parish, Louisiana, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 542) for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co., of Ohio, have reconsidered that case, and have arrived at the same conclusion they did when the bill was reported by its order some weeks since, and have directed me to report the bill back without amendment. There is a report already on file which the committee adhere to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, have had it under consideration, and have directed me to report the same back with certain amendments. I will say that the committee has not added one dollar to the aggregate amount of appropriations. Some changes have been made, but the committee has deferred action on the bill for several days, hoping that some increase in the revenues of the Treasury might occur, so that additions might be made which seemed desirable. I give notice that on Monday next at one o'clock I shall attempt to call up this bill for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 668) to incorporate the Anglo-Saxon Mutual Company, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and suggest that the bill properly belongs to the Committee on Railroads, as it is a bill to connect the Western North Carolina Railroad with roads in the Mississippi Valley. In referring this to the Committee on Railroads I take leave to make the remark that as it refers to the transportation of the products of the country and the incorporation of railroads by act of Congress for that purpose, I hope the Committee on Railroads of the Senate will at an early day—I trust at an early day next week—report the bill back that was referred to them some time ago introduced by me on this subject so as to facilitate cheap transportation.

The Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew Clarke, late a private in the Fifty-third Indiana Volunteers, praying to be reimbursed for money paid for a substitute after he had been drafted, and from which he was not released but had to serve in person, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MERRIMON. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Ann Holland, praying relief from the United States for injuries received by her husband, Thomas Holland, by the explosion of a shell on March 13, 1866, at the Washington navy-yard, by which said Holland lost his life, have instructed me to report that they are of opinion that an allowance in money ought to be made to her, but they do not deem that they are competent to make such an allowance, and move the case be referred to the Committee on Pensions. I submit a report on the matter, and move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William S. Mitchell, praying for balance claimed to be due for goods furnished the Commissioner of Public Buildings, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Simon Celaya, praying compensation for the rent of buildings at Brownsville, Texas, occupied by the military authorities of the United States in 1864, 1865, and 1866, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3179) granting relief to John L. Williams, of New York, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2844) granting relief to Francis Dodge, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 872) to quiet the title of settlers on certain railroad lands, reported adversely thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Caldar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1620) for the relief of John L. T. Jones, of Montgomery County, Maryland, for rent and damage sustained by the destruction of a dwelling-house by accidental fire while the same was being occupied by United States troops for quarters, reported it with amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Wilson, praying compensation for horses and mules captured by the rebels in consequence as is alleged of the refusal of the pickets to allow him to pass within our lines on the outposts of Washington, in July, 1864, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 506) to further protect the polls in the election of President, Vice-President, and members of Congress, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WASHBURN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of John Brennan, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2463) for the relief of Joseph S. Reed, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Sprinkle, jr., of Oil Creek, Indiana, praying the passage of a joint resolution releasing him from a bid for carrying the mails on route No. 22165, submitted a report thereon accompanied by a bill (S. No. 927) for the relief of Thomas Sprinkle, jr.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 633) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz, late lieutenant in Third United States Cavalry, reported it with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3508) conferring jurisdiction upon the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CARPENTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (S. No. 934) to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from the State courts and for other purposes; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal cases; which was read and passed to the second reading.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That James T. Barclay have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 928) for the relief of David Huestis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STOCKTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 929) authorizing the construction of a tunnel or tunnels upon the bed or beneath the bed of the East River, in the State of New York, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and upon the bed or beneath the bed of the Hudson River, between the cities of New York and Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to say that I have not scrutinized carefully the language of the bill. I offer it by request. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 930) to authorize the Farmers' National Bank of Greensburgh, Pennsylvania, to change its location and name; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 931) to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 932) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Saint John's Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 933) relating to mail contracts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (No. S. 936) for the relief of Lydia Cruger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BECK & WIRTH.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 2211) for the relief of Beck & Wirth, reported by the Committee on Finance, with a very short report, be taken up. It is a bill of great importance to these citizens, but a matter of very little consideration to the Senate. I should be glad to have it passed.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Beck & Wirth, dealers in tobacco, of Chicago, Illinois, $5,773, to reimburse them for money paid on manufactured tobacco under the act of Congress of July 20, 1868, they being entitled to have the money refunded to them under the act of Congress of April 10, 1869, but are unable to produce the technical proof, as required by the Revenue Department, on account of the destruction of the United States collector's, assessor's, and their own books by the great fire of October 9, 1871, at Chicago, Illinois.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OXYGEN GAS COMPANY.

Mr. CONOVER. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 856) to incorporate the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia. I think it will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make one suggestion to the Senator having the bill in charge. It pertains to section 2, where is found a provision that when the streets are broken up to lay gas-mains and so on, they shall be restored substantially and maintained in repair for a period of one year. That I think is an inadequate provision, and I move to amend the bill so as to read that they shall be restored to their former condition as far as possible. The word "substantially" is very vague.

Mr. CONOVER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I know nothing about the details of this bill, but I wish to say that if its tendency is to give to the citizens of Washington better and more especially cheaper gas, I shall be very glad.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I may say that the bill provides that this company shall furnish gas at the same rate that was provided in the bill regulating gas-works passed at a former date. This company claim that they can furnish a better quality of gas and at a lower rate; and if they can, it seems proper that they should have an opportunity.

Mr. WEST. I move to strike out of the bill in section 8, commencing at the words "and said company," in line 5, all the rest of that section. My object is to prevent the company from exercising the privilege of entering the premises of any one between the hour of eight o'clock in the morning and sundown and forcibly taking the meter away. That occurrence might happen at a great many peoples' residences when they were absent from the city, which would be disagreeable to say the least. The company can properly protect themselves against the consumption of gas by being permitted to stop off the gas at the end of ten days for non-payment; but the proper way is to make the party pay for the meter before it is put in, as is done in some cities. That is the way to protect the company; but in this case they have the power to enter a residence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in section 8, commencing in line 5, the following words:

> And said company, after giving forty-eight hours' notice, either written or printed, left at the residence or premises of such person or persons of their intention to do so, may enter said premises at any time between the hours of eight o'clock in the forenoon and two o'clock in the afternoon, and remove the meter from said premises.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think if the Senator from Louisiana will examine the statistics on this subject he will find that this is precisely similar to the provisions existing in similar laws in American cities and in European. The company here are required to furnish the gas-meters at their own expense, and it is proper that they should have the power where parties refuse to pay their bills to remove the meters.

Mr. WEST. I have an instance within my experience where just the reverse of this proposition is practiced. I shall not urge the amendment I suggest any more upon the Senate, but I call the attention of Senators to the fact that they are probably about to bring upon themselves by this provision a very great inconvenience. This occurrence might happen to a great many houses that were shut up during the summer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the amendment?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I ask for the vote of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question being put; there were on a division—ayes 5, noes 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Let us divide again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is evidently a quorum present, and the Chair will put the question again.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand the provision of this bill, it authorizes this company to send any person to a resident's house at any time between eight o'clock in the morning and two in the afternoon, and forcibly to enter it. The employés of this company under that protection might enter it for very villainous purposes and ransack the whole house when the family was absent. I do not think there ought to be any such provision in any law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It will be noticed that this cannot be done until forty-eight hours' notice has been given.

Mr. WEST. Suppose nobody is at home?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then the notice cannot be given.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 13, noes 27.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the bill in section 8, line 5, by inserting before the word "notice" the word "personal."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-ROUTES.

Mr. COOPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3604) to establish certain post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

THE COPYRIGHT LAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 876) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyrights, which was to amend the bill by increasing the fee to be paid for recording the title of any print or label not a trade-mark from three to six dollars.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3673) making an additional appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River, and for other purposes;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane;

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of B. W. Harris, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Massachusetts;

A bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the opening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital at Detroit, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one-hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence;

A bill (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 3073) relating to embassadors, consuls, and other officers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3601) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876;

A bill (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin at Oshkosh;

A bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay, assignee of the builders of the steamers La Portena, Edward Everett, F. W. Lincoln, Azalia, and N. P. Banks;

A bill (S. No. 793) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the schooner Jennie Spear to that of Santa Rosa;

A bill (S. No. 870) giving the assent of Congress to the acceptance by the officers of the United States ship Monocacy of silver medals presented to them by the King of Siam;

A bill (S. No. 529) to authorize an appointment in the Inspector-General's Department;

A bill (S. No. 533) granting a pension to Uriah W. Briggs;

A bill (S. No. 624) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands granted to the State of Oregon in certain cases; and

A bill (S. No. 658) granting a pension to Martin V. Jackson.

WASHINGTON STREET-RAILWAY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the first bill on the Calendar, being House bill No. 2102.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending to the bill, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section 1, lines 19 and 20, to strike out "Twelfth street west," and insert "Eleventh street west."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have several amendments which I desire to offer to the bill. The first is in section 2, line 3, to strike out the words "the general laws of the District of Columbia," and insert the word "law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the Senator state where this road goes; on what line it is to run?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The road begins south of the avenue on Fourteenth street, passes down by the Smithsonian Institution and the Agricultural grounds, runs up through Maryland avenue to the front of the Capitol, crosses in front of the Capitol over the track already laid, then passes up Third street to O street north, crosses over O street north to Eleventh street, down Eleventh street to E street, and down E street to the point of beginning.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have followed in my mind the general course of the road as stated by the Senator, and it seems to be a kind of circular road round the city. Now, we have already imposed upon the people of this District pretty heavy burdens. Take the case of Third street, which I have driven over recently with a great deal of pleasure, which is paved with a wooden pavement nicely laid; and here it is proposed to cut it up at once by a line of railroad. I think if new railroads are to be chartered it ought to be done in pursuance of some general system by competent officers appointed for the purpose. Railroads are a great convenience to the people. They ought to be built and favored as much as possible. They are the cheapest mode of transportation to all those who have no carriages; but some little regard ought to be paid to the rights of property-holders whose property may be injured by the passage of one of these roads. I am not prepared to resist the bill, but I ask the Senator whether it has ever received the recommendation of the board of public works of this District?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is subject to their approval.

Mr. SHERMAN. But if this charter is granted, their disapproval would not prevent the building of the road. I would ask also whether it has received the recommendation of any United States officer here; for instance, General Babcock, who has charge of the public buildings and grounds?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not aware that he has been consulted on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the road go through the public grounds or between the public grounds?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It passes the public buildings and grounds on the south and affords a means of communication and travel there to the public which they really need. This is a House bill. It has passed the House and has been reported favorably by the Senate committee. It has been considered here on two or three occasions during the morning hour, and I hope the Senate will now dispose of it. I am pressed by parties interested who are very anxious on the subject. The property-holders along the line generally assent to it and desire the passage of the bill. It has been considered on two or three several occasions, and I am disposed to ask the Senate now to vote on the bill. If they choose to vote it down, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it to be a double-track or a single-track road?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A single track.

Mr. MORTON. Some representations have been made to me from persons living on the line of this projected road which lead me to believe that it is desired and that it is important that the road should be constructed. I shall therefore vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no doubt my friend from Nebraska is very anxious to get rid of this bill; I should be if I had it in charge. But I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this railroad runs and completes almost a hollow square right in the center of the city, going not to the extremities by three or four or five squares in any direction, and it crosses the public mall twice, once directly in front of the Capitol, and once on Twelfth street. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that it is an eminently fit bill to be postponed until after the commission which has been proposed shall be established to say where all these railroads shall be authorized to be built and constructed with the least inconvenience to the city and with the greatest amount of accommodation to the citizens thereof. Therefore, in order to make a test question of the matter, I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK rose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will withdraw the motion if the Senator desires to speak upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire in the first place that the action of the Senate should be had on the amendments in order that the bill may be perfected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There will not be time to act on the amendments and then accomplish the purpose I have in view during the morning hour. I am sure it will answer the purpose of the Senator from Nebraska as well to have a test question upon it now as at any time. It is distinctly understood by the Senate that the proposition that I make is to postpone not only this but three or four more railroad bills equally objectionable until there can be some order and system applied to the whole scheme of railroads in the city. I therefore move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now I hope the Senate will allow these amendments to be acted upon. Certainly there can be no objection to that being done. Several of them were suggested by the honorable Senator himself. They are designed to guard and restrict this bill and to protect the rights of the public.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the bill should be amended I should still be unwilling to have any further number of these railroads chartered until there shall be some order and system established about the whole matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very well. After these amendments are made it will be time enough then to discuss that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont whether it would not be better and wiser to move to postpone the bill until the next session?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If it will be more agreeable to my friend, I will submit that motion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I prefer that these amendments shall be acted upon. They can all be acted upon in the morning hour, I think, if the Senator will allow us to go on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will change my motion to a motion to postpone the bill until the next session.

Mr. MORTON. Why not let the amendments be acted upon?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then there will not be time to take the test question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I prefer that that test question shall not be taken now. When the Senator proposes to have that test question taken, the Committee on the District of Columbia will have something to say in regard to the duties and rights of that committee and in regard to the duties and rights which properly belong to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia is not present at this time. There is abundant time during the morning hour to consider these amendments, and then or some other occasion when the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia is here, the test question which the Senator speaks of can be met and met properly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to remark that if we are going to do that, there is no use in taking up time in considering the amendments.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be reported.

The first amendment was in section 2, line 3, to strike out the words "general laws of the District of Columbia," and insert "law;" so as to read "liable to taxation as is or may be provided by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3, lines 5 and 6, to strike out the words "to be determined by the board of public works," and in lieu thereof to insert "a plate varying for street vehicles of not less width, exclusive of the car-wheel bearing, than that now in use on the Washington and Georgetown Railroad."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 5, line 1, after the word "Government" to insert "or the proper authorities of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 7, of the same section, to insert after the word "company" the words "at its own expense."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 9, line 4, to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven," and in line 5 to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

And shall run cars thereon during the day and as late at night as eleven o'clock and as often as every ten minutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 10, line 6, after the word "necessary" to insert "not exceeding one block in distance in any one place."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 10 the words "and not to exceed $200,000 in value."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 11, line 1, to strike out the word "inadvertently."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 12, line 18, after the word "void" to insert "and said payment shall in no case be withdrawn or loaned to any member of said company."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 14 the following words:

And no part of the capital stock paid in shall at any time be withdrawn by said company or any member thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 18, line 5, before the words "general regulations" to insert the word "lawful."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 19, line 4, to strike out the word "value" and insert "amount."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the report of the committee of conference on the finance bill.

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Committee on Printing have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. In fact we have been doing so, and our consciences somewhat reproach us that we are enjoying ourselves up above in an investigating committee while you are bearing the heat and burden of the day below. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 830) granting one condemned cannon to Prescott Post No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, for the erection of a monument at Providence, Rhode Island.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward H. Calvert; and

An act (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama.

THE CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a short time upon this financial report to discuss briefly two propositions: first, that this is a compromise; and, second, that the Pacific coast Senators are influenced in their views upon this legislation and upon the general financial policy by local considerations; that we are provincial; that we are governed by the nature of a principal industry of our coast. Upon each of these propositions I desire to be heard briefly.

The merit claimed for this measure, brought forward by the committee of conference, is that it is a compromise. Mr. President, why should we compromise upon this question? A compromise implies a retreat between the two parties who make it from a previous position to some common intermediate ground. Now, if I am right in my views upon this matter, if Senators who think with me are right, if our views are founded upon principle and experience, if a continuance in the course which our policy would indicate is required by principle, why should we retreat from the point we have maintained? Is there any obligation on either side of this Chamber to compromise on this question? Is it an arbitration, where we are bound in honor by the award? Both Houses of Congress, judged by recent votes, are in favor of inflation. There is no difficulty in the majority of each House arranging their views; and they have met in committee and so arranged them. How does that arrangement bind, either in good faith or in expediency, the minority in either House of Congress who doubt the propriety of the conclusions to which the majority have arrived? The reply comes from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who for the first time in my legislative observation seems to be frightened, for the first time addresses considerations to the Senate which are not founded on absolute right, but on timidity. He tells us that if we do not settle this question here and now, the people will settle it; that it will go out to be discussed in every congressional district in the Union. Why should it not? He says here is the place to settle this question. True, here is the place to record the final edict, and here may be the place to correct the errors of public opinion, but nevertheless we are representatives; this is a representative Government, and we have a right under all circumstances, and it is our duty, to refer great questions to the people. We come back here refreshed in strength or corrected; we come back like Hercules after his visit to mother earth, refreshed and strengthened. The people is the source from which we should draw inspiration, and I have no fear of an appeal to the people on this or any other question. Therefore, sir, that argument can have no force with those who believe that they stand upon principle, as we thought the Senator himself did in his long concurrence with us.

No compromise can be made or can stand which involves a sacrifice of principle. Compromises are the mere traps of the unwary. They have been so all through our history. They have been mere bull-rush dams set up for the time being to oppose some powerful current of public sentiment. Look at the compromises which we have made. The most notable, the Missouri compromise, was laid down in 1820 and 1821 as an inviolable compact, never to be disturbed; and yet when its conditions fettered the growths of certain interests it was swept away. The argument was urged on this floor and the other House, in a heated controversy, that this was a violation of solemn pledges and sacred compacts; that national faith was involved in the highest degree, but yet it went like flax before the flame; it had no force to bind the legislative power, ay, no force to bind even the conscience of the nation. And how was it with the compromises of 1850? They were announced as a final and conclusive settlement both in form and substance of the pending issues and of all questions growing out of slavery. When the democratic party met in Baltimore in 1852, the then dominant party of the country, they announced this as the fact in their platform, and they elected Franklin Pierce upon that very issue; but these compromises did not outlast the administration of Mr. Pierce. Favored by the President himself and by the dominant democratic majority in Congress, acts were passed by which those compromises were thrown to the winds.

I ask Senators who believe that this measure is not fully wise but may possibly be accepted as a measure of compromise, if with these experiences, and many others that I might name, they think we bind by this compromise, as it is called, legislative action hereafter or the public conscience? We do nothing of the kind; and this, like every other step of the kind which has ever been taken, is a mere trap for unwary feet, a mere expedient for the time being; an expedient to accomplish certain results covetously desired, with a promise that nothing more in the same direction will be aimed for, when all our experience and the experience of the world shows that compromises are the tools of schemers, that they deceive only the unthinking, that they are often prostituted to base purposes, and that they never subserve any good end by restraining further action in the direction they pursue after they have led those who stood on principle to depart from their convictions.

Now, sir, is this proposition a compromise of principle? If this is a mere question of expediency, a mere question of policy, if there are no party pledges, if there are no legislative promises, if there is no national faith involved, if it is like many other questions which we pass on day after day, a simple question of amounts, which may be more or less without involving any sacrifice of consistency or principle, then perhaps it is a legitimate subject for compromise. But if both parties in this Chamber by national conventions, by public documents, by solemn acts, have pledged their faith in a certain line, and this is a step away from that path, a step backward, a retreat, then I say it implies not only party dishonor but it implies national dishonor.

It may be somewhat trite to refer to the acts and resolutions of the past. Senators may be impatient of listening to the promises which they have made, which not only individual Senators but organizations represented here which embrace us all have made. But I ask when we are to turn away from those promises if it is not wholesome for us to pause a moment and read them, and see what they were? I ask Senators, whether from the West or the East, whether in favor of inflation or otherwise, if these solemn promises made to the people ought not to be kept until such time as the people can reconsider these promises, and by a legitimate method release their representatives? Until that time we are bound according to my conscience. When honorably released, when the people themselves shall say we may pursue another course, it being referred to them in popular elections or in national conventions, then we may retreat from the position which we have taken, at their instance, and promised to maintain, but until then, without dishonor, never.

In 1868 after the war was over and business was endeavoring to struggle back to normal conditions, the republican national convention met, and I will refer to that first because the republicans are in the majority in this Chamber. They nominated at that time the present President for his first election, and in reply to specific agitations at that time they declared:

We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime; and the national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the uttermost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted.

Nobody doubted at that time the meaning of that. Nobody doubted that the President, when subsequently he sent his first annual message to Congress, when before even that he delivered his inaugural address, correctly interpreted the spirit of that resolution. I wish to show how Grant understood that platform. He was inaugurated on the 4th of March, 1869, and what did he then say with the approval of the party? You cannot find me an utterance of one of my friends about me who to-day finds it inconvenient to forget the pledges to which I am referring which contained one word of rebuke at that time or since down to within a few months, of sentiments like those which were advanced by the President then or subsequently after he had reiterated those sentiments. The President said in the inaugural address as we stood around him and listened to his words with pleasure and approval, and they were received with approval all over the country:

A great debt has been contracted in securing to us and our posterity the Union; the payment of this, principal and interest, as well as the return to a specie basis, as soon as it can be accomplished without material detriment to the debtor class or to the country at large, must be provided for. To protect the national honor every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold, unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Let it be understood that no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public place, and it will go far toward strengthening a credit which ought to be the best in the world, and will ultimately enable us to replace the debt with bonds bearing less interest than we now pay. To this should be added a faithful collection of the revenue, a strict accountability to the Treasury for every dollar collected, and the greatest practicable retrenchment in expenditure in every Department of Government.

In that same address, Senators will remember, he appealed to the young men of the country, "those who from their age must be its rulers twenty-five years hence," as having "a peculiar interest in maintaining the national honor." I say we understood and commended those utterances at that time. How we understood them is evidenced by the first law which we passed. The first law in the sixteenth volume of the Statutes shows what effect we gave to the utterances of the President at that time, and how far those utterances agreed with our own convictions. In order to relieve my voice I send to the Secretary and ask that he may read—and it is wholesome reading, considering the tenor of this debate on one side of it—the first statute which was passed under General Grant's administration, approved March 18, 1869. This was within two weeks of the utterances I have just read.

An act to strengthen the public credit.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States o America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared, that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Mr. SARGENT. The United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Am I not right in saying that we understood and approved the utterances of the President of the United States in that inaugural message? But he reiterated them afterward.

On the 6th of December, 1869, the President, in his annual message, said:

Among the evils growing out of the rebellion and not yet referred to is that of an irredeemable currency. It is an evil which I hope will receive your most earnest attention. It is a duty, and one of the highest duties of government, to secure to the citizen a medium of exchange of fixed, unvarying value. This implies a return to a specie basis, and no substitute for it can be devised. It should be commenced now, and reached at the earliest practicable moment consistent with a fair regard to the interests of the debtor class. Immediate resumption if practicable would not be desirable. It would compel the debtor class to pay, beyond their contracts, the premium on gold at the date of their purchase, and would bring bankruptcy and ruin to thousands.

Fluctuations, however, in the proper value of the measure of all values, gold, is detrimental to the interests of trade. It makes the man of business an involuntary gambler, for in all sales where future payment is to be made both parties speculate as to what will be the value of the currency to be paid and received. I earnestly recommend to you, then, such legislation as will insure a gradual return to specie payments and put an immediate stop to fluctuations in the value of currency.

And on December 4, 1871, and before his renomination by the republican national convention, he said plainly, so that no one could doubt his views or how he understood his pledges:

Continued fluctuations in the value of gold, as compared with the national currency, has a most damaging effect upon the increase and development of the country in keeping up prices of all articles necessary in every-day life. It fosters a spirit of gambling prejudicial alike to national morals and the national finances. If the question can be met as to how to give a fixed value to our currency, that value constantly and uniformly approaching par with specie, a very desirable object will be gained.

He did not seek renomination by obscuring his views. These were carefully and boldly uttered in his state papers. The convention and the people understood him. We were all in accord with him.

Sir, in view of these declarations of the President, and in view of the course which Congress had taken by the adoption of the law which I have caused to be read, the national republican convention met again and laid down their platform. This meeting was in 1872, with the law of 1869 on the statute-book, with these public messages of the President before the people, and the party indorsed both by new resolutions and by renominating him. The platform of 1872 says:

We denounce repudiation of the public debt in any form or disguise as a national crime. We witness with pride the reduction of the principal of the debt, of the rates of interest upon the balance, and confidently expect that our excellent national currency will be perfected by a speedy resumption of specie payments.

In view of these declarations so recent, declarations upon which we elected this Administration, declarations upon which some of us obtained seats on this floor, coming in here contemporary with the second term of this Administration, does it sound well to sneer at a speedy return to specie payments, to say that we were once infected with that mania, but have gotten over it; that we have grown wiser than the party, superior to party pledges?

In the message of the President, December 2, 1872, following that election, he again committed the party to the policy of a speedy return to specie payments. He said:

The preservation of our national credit is of the highest importance. Next in importance to this comes a solemn duty to provide a national currency of fixed, unvarying value as compared with gold; and as soon as practicable, having due regard for the interests of the debtor class and the vicissitudes of trade and commerce, convertible into gold at par.

When this Congress met the President renewed his recommendation in favor of measures looking to the return to specie payments, strictly in accordance with the national platform and his former declarations. In view of the panic he said:

My own judgment is that, however much individuals may have suffered, one long step has been taken toward specie payments; that we can never have permanent prosperity until a specie basis is reached.

Again he said—

To increase our exports, sufficient currency is required to keep all the industries of the country employed. Without this, national as well as individual bankruptcy must ensue. Undue inflation, on the other hand, while it might give temporary relief, would only lead to inflation of prices, the impossibility of competing in our own markets for the products of home skill and labor, and repeated renewals of present experiences. Elasticity to our circulating medium, therefore, and just enough of it to transact the legitimate business of the country and to keep all industries employed, is what is most to be desired. The exact medium is specie, the recognized medium of exchange the world over. That obtained, we shall have a currency of an exact degree of elasticity. If there be too much of it for the legitimate purposes of trade and commerce, it will flow out of the country. If too little, the reverse will result. To hold what we have, and to appreciate our currency to that standard, is the problem deserving of the most serious consideration of Congress.

In announcing views like these, was the President recreant to party obligations, was he inconsistent with party pledges and party platforms? If not, are we if we support the measure reported by this committee or any of those multiform schemes of inflation which have been brought to our attention during the last weary five months? In this same message, in the most earnest language, he protested against an inflation that would put off indefinitely the resumption of specie payments. Does any one believe that by a step backward, by the emission of more paper, we do not put off the return to specie payments? Does any one doubt that the people, intoxicated by further draughts of irredeemable currency, business and speculation inflated by means of an unnatural aliment, will speak with such force to future Congresses in the spirit of the man approaching delirium tremens, who thinks his only relief is in deeper draughts, that they will sweep Senators from their feet and from any compromise which they now make? If in view of these recent pledges we cannot stand up until another presidential election against these frantic cries that come from some quarters for more currency, more paper, more irredeemable currency, how with these feelings aggravated, the aggravation caused by this very inflation, can you stand the greater clamor we shall bring in upon ourselves?

I ask, are we false to the past, or is Grant false to the past, when he sends messages like these to Congress? If it is a question of consistency, certainly inconsistency does not lie at his door, and it does not lie with those of us who have stood here for months fighting against these schemes in the different forms in which they have presented themselves. If there is inconsistency, let those who are guilty of it and let those whose speeches put in parallel columns would destroy each other account of this inconsistency defend themselves. I say that we stand here consistent with national pledges, with party pledges, with our previous declarations, and the President is consistent with his and with us.

I have thus shown, what every Senator knew, which no Senator should forget, which no Senator shall forget if I can help it, the record of the party repeatedly made in national convention. We have that of the President often repeated and reiterated so that no one can misunderstand it, and we have the record of Congress right in the teeth of this proposed legislation. Sir, were these declarations thus made mere temporary utterances not intended to be immutable, not intended to assert principles? The answer is that they were consistently and oftentimes repeated as if by set purpose, and judging them by any rule that would apply to the declarations of a party, they were intended to mark out a consistent course of policy.

Were they intended merely to catch votes? Was that the object of them? If that is asserted, then the voters must have been in favor of those principles. Then it was a concession to public sentiment. You cannot catch votes by enunciating sentiments repugnant to voters, for they will repudiate your cause. But it was simply because you touched the chord of national feeling, because you could rally voters to your support for the election of your administration by announcing principles like these that you announced them; because national honor is dear to a patriot, dear to a patriotic people; because they will not have it sullied knowingly and intentionally; and I tell Senators you cannot lead the people in the wrong but they will discover it before much time elapses and return to punish those who so mislead them. These utterances were not casual, and they were not merely to catch votes; they expressed a principle, and a principle that was acceptable to the people, because the people adopted the party which gave it most distinct utterance. And, furthermore, they were not casual and were not made merely to catch votes, because they were in direct reply to schemes of repudiation. Every one remembers that in 1868 and for a little while thereafter, until the national debt began to be reduced and until the solemn declaration which I have caused to be read from the statute-book was passed by Congress implying that the national faith was ever pledged to prevent such schemes, under the lead of Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, (a gentleman on whom I do not desire to reflect at all, although I think his views extravagant, unsound, and injurious,) there was a scheme to emit paper money limited only by the amount of the national debt, unlimited expansion except by the fact that they did not desire to float or have sink more than enough to pay off the $2,000,000,000 of the national debt. This was the scheme. It was in reply to it that these platforms were laid down. On the stump we justified the planks of these platforms by showing the fallacy and the danger of the scheme of Pendleton and others whom I might name that we called a repudiation of the public debt; though it was not admitted by its authors to be repudiation, but was said to be simply a large issue of national notes.

Furthermore, I say that these views are not novel. They were not taken in 1868 and 1872 and by Congress as mere experiments. It cannot be denied that they have been enforced by every sound writer on political economy, ancient and modern. They are the true basis of national prosperity; they are the only basis for a sound currency. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has often instructed us in this. I have listened with pleasure to his discourses in this direction in which he has insisted that our feet could only stand firm, that national prosperity could only be secured if we would stand by the principles which are laid down in these platforms, which have been enunciated in the messages of the President of the United States, and which have been enforced, as I say and as he knows, by all sound writers on political economy, ancient and modern.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will interrupt the Senator, if he will allow me, so far as to say that every word he has said thus far in regard to the necessity of specie payments meets my hearty approval. All the messages of the President meet my most hearty approval. The repeated legislation of Congress meets my hearty approval. But the question I wish to put to him, and upon that the difference between me and him turns, is whether or not the time by this bill, and the mode and manner fixed by this bill, is not the earliest practicable way to come to specie payments. If he convinces me that I am wrong on that point, that I am in error, I shall acknowledge it. If he can show me that by simply doing nothing and turning this thing over to the future and to the issue of popular elections, we can accomplish the golden age that both he and I think better, then I will acknowledge my error and confess my sin. But I do candidly and honestly believe that the measure now pending names the earliest practicale time for resumption. If he has any views to present on that point, I shall listen with great respect.

Mr. SARGENT. I listened yesterday with great attention to the questions which the Senator from Ohio propounded to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] The Senator from Massachusetts took pains to answer carefully and elaborately the proposition which the Senator now advances. I am speaking on another subject, as the Senator well knows. I am speaking of party pledges. I am resisting the idea of a compromise of a principle. My judgment concurred with the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, and that argument remains unanswered. I believe, and firmly believe, that by the same course we have pursued of letting the business of the country grow up to the volume of the currency, a currency the depreciation of which measures its redundancy, we should get to specie payments, and get there before the time fixed in this bill. But we shall not get there by the time fixed by the Senator from Ohio, or at any other time by pursuing the policy laid down in this bill; that you cannot get there by the issue of more paper money. Our only hope of doing it is not by a violent contraction—for I am not in favor of that, although I believe that would be a less injury than expansion—but by the ordinary rules of trade, by the growth your population, by the increase and development of your resources, by the accumulation of wealth, by causing your commerce to whiten the seas, by setting machinery in motion, by the growth of society. All these things are solving this problem. They have solved it to a certain extent, and were more rapidly solving it when the mischievous agitation of this Congress, joined to some other temporary causes alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, gave us a back-set on the path we were pursuing. Now the Senator asks us to deflect from that straight path, to turn in another direction; and he tells us that we shall reach the point we aim at by traveling away from it. Sir, I cannot see it in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the permission of the Senator, I will interrupt him to make a further remark. He and I have the same purpose in view and have a distinct issue to present to the Senate. He proposes that we shall reach specie payments by doing nothing, by pursuing the course which has been adopted by the Government for the last four years. I propose by a solemn pledge made with the sanction of all parties that in less than four years we shall reach specie payments. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts did not answer the point that four years ago to-day we were nearer specie payments than we are at this moment according to the price of gold. All this talk about the German war and these other things amounts to nothing. The Senator and I have one object in view. I want to redeem party pledges; but higher than that, I want to redeem the nation's honor, pledged by both parties. I want to attain the same result that he does. The only question is as to the mode and manner of attaining it. I say the mode adopted by this compromise report is the easiest, clearest, and quickest way. Let us confine the issue in this matter, not to any party question, but to the point, what will approach the end desired in the easiest way. Let him demonstrate to me that simple, quiet, non-action on this subject will bring us nearer and nearer, and more quickly to specie payments than the manner here proposed, and I will vote with him.

Mr. STEWART. When the Senator from California gets through, I shall be prepared to join issue with the Senator from Ohio on this question, particularly in regard to the eighth section.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I impeach no man's motives. We are here as a Senate of equals, as was remarked many years ago, and each Senator is impelled to pursue his own course, is governed by his own convictions. But I cannot agree with the Senator from Ohio that this is not a question of party pledges or of national honor. To me it is, and I have endeavored to show that these considerations are of the highest importance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say it is a question of party pledges and national honor.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I am relieved somewhat from the fear which troubled my mind, that I was unnecessarily referring to these past declarations of the party made by ourselves and by our administration. If the determination of the question is to depend on previous pledges and declarations, then certainly it is well that these declarations and promises should be read in order that we may see how closely they are followed in what is now proposed. This subject should not be disposed of without a reference to them.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has referred to party pledges and to the act of 1869 pledging us to specie payments at the earliest practicable moment. I should like to understand from the Senator now what those pledges and the act of 1869 mean? Is it that we shall simply do nothing and let time take care of the question?

Mr. SARGENT. Time, business men, and business growth will do it. I believe as the rain waters the earth and brings forward the crop of the husbandman, so the natural growth of business, so the very laws laid down by nature itself governing trade, the natural laws of trade, will bring about resumption. Redundancy of currency makes depreciation, and the depreciation measures that redundancy, as I said a moment ago. If there is too much paper afloat for it to realize the value of its face, then it depreciates, and the amount that will float at standard value is greater or less as there is more or less population, more or less legitimate employment for money. If we have too much paper money out, by the natural laws of trade the country will grow up to that volume if you do nothing to inflate that amount. That is my idea. I do not say that I am doing nothing, that I recommend that nothing shall be done, in other words. I do recommend that the country be let alone to grow. The public health is in danger from quack nostrums. Let the country get well. You may cut a coat too large for a child, but you do not propose to catch hold of the child and stretch his limbs in order to make him fit the coat. Let him alone, if it is necessary for him to wear the coat, and the child will grow to fill the coat. You object to contraction—to cutting the coat down. I also am not in favor of contraction, because it is a rough means of reaching the end; but I am in favor of allowing the growth of the Republic to absorb this immense volume of money which we threw out at the time it was in danger, and when it was necessary for its safety that we should do it. That was an expedient justified and necessitated by the conditions of war. Now that we are in a condition of peace we should not resort to those expedients of war. I beg the Senator to draw the distinction between doing nothing and doing this. The country is doing something day by day. Look at your census reports; look at your trade reports. The country is growing continually. The very register of births shows that the country is growing. There is an increase of population, of wealth, of business, of development in every direction; and it is this growth which absorbs your redundant currency. You blink that out of sight, you reason without taking that into consideration; but admitting the growth of the country, you cannot accuse us who do not desire to inflate the currency with a purpose of standing still. The mistake you make is that Congress must do something. Let the country do something. It will not make the mistakes to which we are liable. To recur to my figure. Enlarging the coat will not make it better fit the child. So inflation only increases the depreciation or the disparity between the volume of currency and the business needs of the country.

I should like to show the Senator from Indiana himself, if he will allow me, not with any purpose of fastening a charge of inconsistency upon him, but to show that he and I understood this matter alike, and as I now understand it, at the very time the legislation I referred to was under consideration, at the very time this platform was being laid down; that he thought the point to "start from" was specie payments. I cite it to show him that in my reasoning on this subject I am simply pursuing a road which he himself has traveled, and traveled contemporaneously with this very legislation. On the 11th of March, 1869, as I have said, contemporary with this legislation, my friend from Indiana, who has so ably led this debate for inflation, said this:

My views from the beginning have been in favor of a return to specie payments, and if Congress had directed its attention less to the character of the contract in regard to the bonds and more to making provision for a return to specie payments it would have been better for the bondholders and for the people this day. The resumption of specie payments is the starting point.

That was the starting point; not something in the future, not something to be postponed until 1878, with another presidential election to intervene; but that was the starting point at that time, and certainly the argument is as good now as it was then.

I do not care what the character of the contract is and I do not care how you legislate, there is the starting point, and when that is accomplished all the rest settles itself.

Mr. President, this bill does contain one provision that I am glad of, and it is this: And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of United States notes in coin.

These views, I think, are eminently sound, and they show how the very men of the Senate who now lead in favor of inflation understood this legislation at the time it was passed, how they understood the pledge which was implied; and we cannot now legislate in the other direction, it seems to me—I say it with all deference—without a violation of the pledges made at that time. The Senator said further:

Sir, that is worth all the rest. It will do more than all the rest to strengthen the public credit. Who can doubt it? And in view of this solemn pledge this Congress ought not to adjourn without making some provision for the purpose of redeeming the United States notes in coin according to the terms of this solemn promise; and when that is done all the rest adjusts and settles itself.

It was a solemn promise, said the Senator from Indiana. I only say now that it is, and has been all the time, a solemn promise. All these promises are solemn, and they are promises to whom? Not merely to the holders of United States notes, but to the people who elected us, to the people of this country who on just such doctrines as these thought we were worthy of places here. In that speech my friend referred to another made at the close of the previous Congress, in which he said:

The greenback currency is a part of the public debt, for the redemption of which the faith of the nation is solemnly pledged.

The redemption of this pledge is not only demanded by every principle of national honor, but is imperatively demanded by the interests of the people, collectively and individually. The currency of a country lies at the foundation of its daily business and vitally affects the interest of every class and condition of people, and if the Government, overlooking its honor and its duty—

Honor and duty! I have not used more expressive words; I have not been able to do so—should take the only means by which it can be improved and apply it to the purchase of bonds which will not be due for many years, it would merit and receive the indignation and contempt of honest men everywhere.

In regard to the redemption of these notes, it has never been a question of ability but of purpose; and to say that these notes cannot be paid until the general credit of the Government is improved by the expenditure of some hundreds of millions in the purchase of bonds that will not be due for years, is to fly into the face of common sense and insult the intelligence of the people.

Speaking of the effects of the depreciation of the currency, the Senator said what I will read. I do not care to elaborate upon the evils produced by a depreciation of the currency. When I can find a text like this, so able, so clear, expressing my ideas so fully, I think a citation of it is sufficient to convince the Senate that the evils flowing from a depreciated and fluctuating currency are of supreme magnitude. He said:

It is impossible to calculate the aggregate loss to the country, even in one year, by this state of things, or to estimate the suffering and destitution produced by stagnation of business and the want of employment for labor; and it is not only the business, but the imperative duty, of Congress to address itself to the great work of reform, by adopting such legislation, if possible, whereby the currency shall be made good, and business be made to flow on prosperously through its regular channels. The business transactions of the country, amounting to many thousand million dollars in the course of the year, are conducted through the medium of the currency, and if the currency is depreciated, fluctuating, and deceptive, the prosperity of the country must inevitably be seriously injured and its general progress and development delayed.

Now, sir, I do not want to see this serious injury to the country.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. This bill proposes a scheme for carrying out the very sentiments announced in what the Senator has read. He is now opposing this scheme and he provides nothing in its place. This bill now embraces the only scheme for a return to specie payments that has ever received any considerable number of votes in the Congress of the United States. No other plan that has ever been proposed, I believe, has received over fifteen votes, while this scheme has received the vote of nearly a majority of the Senate during this session and sessions before. The Senate opposes it and insists upon the do-nothing policy. When the Senator reads the pledge of the republican party in 1868 and 1872 to return to specie payments, and the act of 1869 to return to specie payments at the earliest practicable period, he says all that means simply that we are to do nothing.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, who is deceived by this measure? I am not deceived. Is the Senator from Indiana? I do not care what you call this scheme. You may label it with one name or another. I know its motive, its animus. It has been proclaimed to us during the last five months. The Senator himself, who insisted with all his eloquence and force in favor of inflation without limit, favors this scheme. He thinks this proposition is leading in the direction which he then advocated, and therefore advocates it. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and my friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] urge it strongly as being in the direction which they have told us that Government and Congress and the people must travel, toward inflation. It is urged here on this floor (and to rebuke that is the main idea of my speech to-day) that this is a compromise. A compromise with what? A compromise leading away from specie payments toward inflation. It is a compromise that is all on one side in one direction. It is not a compromise dictated by deference to those who would resume specie payments at the earliest moment. This compromise implies a concession on the part of these toward the doctrines of those who believe in inflation. Therefore it is a step toward inflation. The Senator may call it by another name, if he thinks that will make it sweeter. The scheme may be described in any glowing terms that he may see fit to use. But the more confession is made on this floor that this is a compromise, is a concession, the more strongly it appears that it is what I claim it to be, a step in the wrong direction. The most that can be claimed for it is that it is a short step. I will take none whatever.

But I leave this branch of the subject. It has been said on this floor, it was said yesterday in effect, when a Senator from the Pacific coast rose to give his general views upon the effect of this legislation, "You Senators from the Pacific coast are provincial in your ideas; you are governed simply by the prejudices of locality; you are influenced by the fact that you produce gold and silver. What do you know about the necessities of the rest of the country? Why should your States, remote as they are, prevent other States from having the money of their choice?" And I think almost a sneer was implied when allusion was made to the amount of money which a certain Senator might have as influencing his vote on this occasion, that he might be a millionaire while the man who opposed him might have simply a pittance. I can sympathize with my friend from Illinois in being of the latter class, as he claims to be himself. I am not a millionaire. I call his attention, however, to the fact that the wealthy men in this Chamber are not all on the side of specie payments; they are not all with us on this proposition. It would be offensive to name Senators with particular reference to the amount of their wealth, and I will not do it; but I call his attention to the fact that some of the Senators who favor this report are far more wealthy than the Senator or myself, and perhaps approach the wealth of the Senator to whom he more especially alluded.

But, sir, such considerations are of no value. Ideas must be tried by their intrinsic merit, by their correspondence with the experience of the past, by their soundness, and not by the question whether the man who advocates them has his thousands or his millions.

Furthermore, I might claim in the same way that it makes no difference whether I came from California, having the views that I have, or from Ohio. The ideas of my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and mine on these matters agree. Which of us is provincial, or are we both provincial? Which of us is governed by locality? So with my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON;] so with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER;] so with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] These ideas are not sectional; they are as broad as the country. There are both the Senators from Texas, the Senators from Maine; in each extreme of the country you will find Senators of ability on this floor who support the views advanced by the Senators from the Pacific coast. The cry of local demands comes from another direction entirely.

But, sir, these views are not only not provincial or local, they are the views of the party, as I have already shown. I have read the declarations of the party and of the President of the United States. They are the views of the Administration; they are the views of the republican party as enunciated in national conventions. Will any one tell me that these do not bind us in our political action here? When it shall come to pass that we are no longer bound by the promises which we made, or which were made for us at the time of our election, then I say we no longer have honor. I admit that questions may arise during the term of a Senator, not contemplated at the time of his election, upon which he had never committed himself, on which he is as free as the air to vote and speak as his judgment and conscience may dictate; but I say both judgment and conscience are bound by promises which were made at the time to the constituents who elected him, or who elected the administration with which he acts before the election or at the time of it.

But, sir, these views are not only not provincial, they are not only the ideas of the party and of the Administration, but I am prepared to show and have taken some pains to prepare myself on the proposition, that they are approved and have been enforced by the best statesmen of this country from the earliest times down to the present. Who come in here with new lights, with flaming lanterns, casting a glare on this subject? Who come in here with crude ideas? Who repudiate even their own utterances of a few years past and the utterances of their party? Who go back upon all the teachings of Webster, of Hamilton, of Franklin, of Washington, of Calhoun, of every statesman of every party who has ever won a national reputation or deserved it? Not the Senators from the Pacific coast. We stand here upon those well-considered opinions which have been ingrafted in the jurisprudence and laws of this country from its very foundation, which have been held by sound men of all parties, which have been held by able writers, ancient and modern, foreign and domestic.

Do you tell us that we are influenced by the fact that our portion of the country produces gold and silver? I tell you, sir, that it is our interest locally that your currency here should be depreciated. We trade with the East, as well as others; we owe you bills. We take gold and silver from our hills, and if we can send it here and get two paper dollars for one gold dollar, and with them pay off our debts, we make money by it. If we were governed simply by selfish considerations, we would go with you in these inflation theories. But, sir, there is the safety of the country, there are the teachings of the fathers, there are national obligations, there are party obligations which are superior to all local or selfish considerations.

Now, sir, allow me for a moment to call the attention of the Senate to a few of the more prominent utterances of the men who have gone before us consistent with those of the Senator from one of the Pacific States who spoke yesterday, and entirely consistent with the views which I have expressed this morning. Franklin, the sagacious philosopher, in a letter addressed to Josiah Quincy, under date of Passey, September 11, 1783, wrote as follows:

I lament with you the many mischiefs, the injustice, the corruption of manners, &c., that attend a depreciating currency. It is some consolation to me that I washed my hands of that evil by predicting it in Congress, and proposing means that would have been effectual to prevent it if they had been adopted. Subsequent operations that I have executed demonstrate that my plan was practicable; but it was unfortunately rejected.—Franklin's Works, volume 10, page 9, paragraph 2.

I could quote delarations of George Washington and John Adams showing that they held similar views and expressed them with great force.

Alexander Hamilton, the great Treasury Secretary, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, December 13, 1790, said:

The emitting of paper money by the authority of the Government is wisely prohibited to the individual States by the national Constitution; and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the Government of the United States. Though paper emissions, under a general authority, might have some advantages not applicable and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable to the like emissions by the States separately, yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse—and it may even be affirmed so certain of being abused—that the wisdom of the Government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an expedient. In times of tranquillity it might have no ill consequence; it might even perhaps be managed in a way to be productive of good; but in great and trying emergencies there is almost a moral certainty of its becoming mischievous. The stamping of paper is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, that a government in the practice of paper emissions would rarely fail in any such emergency to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity. If it should not even be carried so far as to be rendered an absolute bubble, it would at least be likely to be extended to a degree which would occasion an inflated and artificial state of things incompatible with the regular and prosperous course of the political economy. Works of Alexander Hamilton, volume 3, page 125.

I could not express these ideas so clearly and so plainly or so pertinently in this debate as they are here stated by Mr. Hamilton. His alternative proposition is the one that has been insisted upon by us here; is, that the national revenue should be increased by the levying of more taxes. You have reduced taxation too rapidly, have taken from the Treasury the means which it was employing, and wisely employing, to reduce the difference between gold and paper, and it was rapidly producing that result. It would appear as though this extract from the works of Alexander Hamilton were written with a view to this debate, certainly with a view to a similar issue.

Now let me quote from Thomas Jefferson, an authority certainly revered by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MCCREERY.] He nods his head in assent. I wish to show the Senator how very far he departs, by voting for the proposition before the Senate, from the doctrines of his great leader, Thomas Jefferson. In 1813, discussing in one of his letters a proposition at that time pending in Congress for more circulation, he says:

The overbearing clamor of merchants, speculators and projectors—

Have we not heard something of that, I ask my friend from Kentucky?

The overbearing clamor of merchants, speculators, and projectors will drive us before them, with our eyes open, until as in France, under the Mississippi bubble, our citizens will be overtaken by the crush of this baseless fabric, without other satisfaction than that of execrations on the heads of those functionaries who, from ignorance, pusillanimity, or corruption have betrayed the fruits of their industry into the hands of projectors and swindlers.

He then argues the necessity of bringing our money to specie values, which I have endeavored to insist upon in the course of this debate; and I commend this passage most particularly to my friend from Kentucky, who admires Thomas Jefferson so much:

That specie is the most perfect medium because it will preserve its own level; because, having intrinsic and universal value, it can never die in our hands, and it is the surest resource of reliance in time of war; that the trifling economy of paper as a cheaper medium, or its convenience for transmission, weighs nothing in opposition to the advantages of the precious metals; that it is liable to be abused, has been, is, and forever will be, abused in every country in which it is permitted; that it is already at a term of abuse in these States which has never been reached by any other nation, France excepted, whose dreadful catastrophe should be a warning against the instrument which produced it; that we are already at ten or twenty times the due quantity of medium, insomuch that no man knows what his property will be worth when the medium shall be relieved from its present dropsical state; is now worth because it is bloating while he is calculating, and still less what it and that it is a palpable falsehood to say we can have specie for our paper whenever demanded.

Instead, then, of yielding to the cries of scarcity of medium set up by speculators, projectors, and commercial gamblers—no endeavors should be spared to begin the work of reducing it by such gradual means as may give time to private fortunes to preserve their poise and settle down with the subsiding medium.—Jefferson's Works, volume 6, page 241.

Are we not yielding to those cries, fellow-Senators?

The course which was recommended by Jefferson is that which has been followed by the country since the war was over. We have avoided that which he deprecated, an expansion of the circulating medium, and we have allowed time to business gradually to settle down as he requires that it shall settle down with the subsiding medium. The continuance of that policy I recommend, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] calls it a "do-nothing policy." Alas, how little Jefferson knew of finance!

Now let me quote from James Madison. I have no doubt the democratic Senators around me appreciate, as we all do and should, certainly they should in particular, his character and ability. In a letter dated February, 1820, he wrote as follows:

It cannot be doubted that a paper currency, rigidly limited in its quantity to purposes absolutely necessary, may be made equal and even superior in value to specie. But experience does not favor a reliance on such experiment. Whenever the paper has not been convertible into specie, and its quantity has depended, on the policy of the Government, a depreciation has been produced by an undue increase, or an appreciation of it.—Madison's Works, volume 3, page 166.

During the war when the paper currency attained a certain maximum amount never since exceeded, we were satisfied because the exigencies of the country required the volume which was then given; but since that time we have not increased it. The proposition now before us is to reverse this thing, but not to make an increase to so great an extent as will satisfy my friend from Indiana and my friend from Illinois. They will come back here next year disappointed, and say this law was a delusion and not a finality; that they have not reaped the results from it they had a right to anticipate, and which the people expected from it, and they will insist that it was a mere stepping-stone, and that Congress should pursue the same direction. But whether they will be satisfied with it or not, one thing is certain, that it is a step toward inflation, or rather it is a concession of the principle that the amount of the circulating medium of the country is to depend upon the current will of Congress, and consequently the result is to be produced which has been predicted here by Mr. Madison, if Madison is an authority upon finance to be respected in these days; that is, that where its quantity depends on the policy of the Government, a depreciation has always been produced or an undue and uncertain value.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as the Senator seems to make up a great part of his speech by allusions as to what he imagines the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Illinois intend hereafter, I should like to ask him what authority he has for saying that I would attempt at the next Congress to inaugurate some other system?

Mr. SARGENT. I will answer the Senator. I do not speak by authority. I simply judge from the force which the Senator gives now to the demands heard up to this time in this direction when he most cheerfully acquiesced, and upon the stump supported all these declarations of his party. I reason from another fact. I refer him and the Senator from Indiana to the declaration of the grangers in council, three thousand of them, which was read yesterday, in which they denounced the idea of any return to specie payments as a delusion, and called for an unlimited supply of paper money. If the Senator, notwithstanding past declarations, which fetter him as well as me, sees the way clear to answer the demands that are made up to this time, I claim that these influences must affect his mind in the future, and induce him to yield to still further demands.

Mr. LOGAN. That is going upon the presumption that other Senators will yield to popular clamor, but that the Senator himself has so much manliness about him that he will not do it. I desire to say right here, and I have said it before, that my desire is to break down the bank monopoly, so that persons in the different States shall have the same privileges under the banking law that others have. This bill accomplishes that object. That is all the fight I have made in reference to this question, and all I desire to make, and it is satisfactory to me. It is a fight to break down all monopoly, so that the people will be put on an equality, and then let the business of the country regulate the quantity. That is my answer to the insinuation of the Senator.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I have made no insinuation; I never insinuate. I say plainly just what I mean; and I speak in no sense of unkindness, and certainly it was very far from my idea to compare myself with the Senator. I do not ask such a comparison. I am not afraid of it; I do not seek it. As to breaking up banking monopoly I will go as far as any one; not by creating new banks and new banking issues and fastening the system more strongly on the country, but by repealing the whole system.

Mr. President, pursuing the line of my remarks, in vindication of the Senators from the Pacific coast who have been rebuked on this floor for their ideas as local, as provincial, as biased by sectional considerations, I wish to quote still further from other early statesmen of the Republic, to show that we are in harmony with them, and then those who now differ from us may consider whether local influences are not those which influence them and not us of the Pacific coast. Daniel Webster said in the House of Representatives in 1816:

Wars and invasions are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They announce their own approach, and the general security is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, or a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischiefs of a paper-money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation, and relief.

And on these very considerations this legislation is urged here:

They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easy payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation.

We have heard of the woes of the debtor class in these debates. The debtor class clamor for this relief say Senators. They want an easy method of the payment of their debts. It is the old story. We of the Pacific coast oppose this legislation because we believe with Mr. Webster that it is fallacious, that it is deceptive, that it gives no real relief, but only brings mischief in the future.

In 1834 Mr. Webster said in this body:

We are in danger of being overwhelmed with irredeemable paper, mere paper, representing not gold nor silver; no, sir, representing nothing but broken promises, bad faith, bankrupt corporations, cheated creditors, and a ruined people.

Has anybody spoken more pertinently against these schemes of inflation on this floor in 1874 than Daniel Webster did in 1834, and as he does now from his grave? No one. No one can surpass in force and in truth the language which I have just quoted.

Again, in 1836, he said:

If we wish to restore the public credit and to re-establish the finances, we have the beaten road before us. All true analogy, all experience, and all just knowledge of ourselves and our condition point one way. A wise and systematic economy, and a settled and substantial revenue, are the means to be relied on.

Those are the means which we propose, the means which were recommended by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yesterday, the means which the Senator from Indiana says are a do-nothing policy. We recommend an increase of the revenue, so that there may be sufficient money in the vaults of the Treasury to prevent the schemes of speculators, that the control of the currency may be in the Treasury and not in Wall street, and at the same time sufficient revenue for the Government:

A wise and systematic economy, and settled and substantial revenues are the means to be relied on; not excessive issues of bank-notes, a forced circulation, and all the miserable contrivances to which political folly can resort, with the idle expectation of giving to mere paper the quality of money. These are the inventions of a short-sighted policy, vexed and goaded by the necessities of the moment, and thinking less of a permanent remedy than of shifts and expedients to avoid the present distress. They have been a thousand times adopted, and a thousand times exploded as delusive and ruinous, as destructive of all solid revenue, and incompatible with the security of private property.

These ideas have been considered and recommended by men of all parties. I have here an extract from Mr. Calhoun, which I have taken from the debates of Congress for the year 1837, in which he says:

The currency of a country is to the community what the blood is to the human system. It constitutes a small part, but it circulates through every portion, and is indispensable to all the functions of life. The currency bears even a smaller proportion to the aggregate capital of the community than what the blood does to the solids in the human system. What that portion is has not been, and perhaps cannot be, accurately ascertained, as it is probably subject to considerable variations. It is probably between twenty-five and thirty-five to one. I will assume it to be thirty to one. With this assumption, let us suppose a community whose aggregate capital is $31,000,000, its currency would be, by supposition, one million, and the residue of its capital thirty millions. This being assumed, if the currency be increased or decreased, the other portion of the capital remains the same, according to the well-known laws of currency; property would rise or fall with increase or decrease; that is, if the currency be increased to two millions, the aggregate value of property would rise to sixty millions; and if the currency be reduced to $500,000, it would be reduced to fifteen millions. With this law so well established, place the money-power in the hands of a single individual, or a combination of individuals, and, by expanding or contracting the currency they may raise or sink prices at pleasure; and by purchasing when at the greatest depression, and selling at the greatest elevation, may command the whole property and industry of the community and control its fiscal operations. The banking system concentrates and places this power in the hands of those who control it, and its force increases just in proportion as it dispenses with a metallic basis. Never was an engine invented better calculated to place the destiny of the many in the hands of the few, or less favorable to that equality and independence which lie at the bottom of all free institutions.—Calhoun; Debates in Congress, volume 14, part 1, 1837, page 476.

Certainly, this is good, sound, democratic financial doctrine, and I want to know from those of my democratic friends who wander away from this doctrine why they have let go of the anchor of their party, of that sure and solid hold by which they won the designation of the "hard-money party?" To come down to more modern times, the very last democratic President in that debate, James Buchanan, said:

The evils of a redundant paper circulation are now manifest to every eye. It alternately raises and sinks the value or every man's property. It makes a beggar of the man to-morrow who is indulging in dreams of wealth to-day. It converts the business of society into a mere lottery, while those who distribute the prizes are wholly irresponsible to the people. When the collapse comes, as come it must, it casts laborers out of employment, crushes manufacturers and merchants, and ruins thousands of honest and industrious citizens.—Buchanan; Debates in Congress, volume 14, part 1, 1837, page 355.

This is simply an amplification of the ideas which I read from my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I do not think they are expressd more forcibly, but simply a little expanded. The kernel is there; it means just the same thing. I believe in and follow all these teachings of the fathers, and therefore I repel the idea that I or those Senators from the Pacific coast who think with me are influenced by any local or sectional consideration.

I need not quote from democratic authority in the past to show that the democracy has always been, until the present curious spectacle presented in this Chamber where so many democratic Senators voted for irredeemable paper schemes, a hard-money party. It may all be summed up in their last national platform. That platform says:

The public credit must be sacredly maintained, and we denounce repudiation in every form and guise. * * * * * *

A speedy return to specie payments is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government.

In the name of commercial morality and of honest government, and in the name of that democratic convention which met to lay down fundamental principles to guide the votes of the party at least through four years, I ask the aid of those Senators in opposing schemes like this.

There is no division of opinion, and never has been until this present session, as to the meaning of those obligations taken by both parties or as to the policy they were intended to enforce. I am not easy of change on these matters. If they are matters of principle I must adhere to them. I do not see the way clearly to brush aside like cobwebs all the teachings of the past. I think that the business and credit of the nation demand that we should return to specie payments and that we should return to them not by these divergent paths, but by more direct means; and if we do not take legislation to accomplish that end, at any rate let the business men of the country free themselves from the incubus that has been upon them ever since the first year of the war. Leave them to themselves and they will rescue their currency. All they desire is an opportunity to do it; all that they ask is that you do not by crude schemes overthrow the operations of the ordinary laws of trade.

I shall vote against this scheme, because I believe it is destructive of public and private interests, because I believe it is crude, because I believe it is reactionary, because I believe that it will aggravate any existing evil, and prevent the realization of benefits toward which the nation has been struggling during the last nine or ten years.

I object to this bill because it is at once a wrong and a delusion; because while it is a fatal departure from the principles of sound financial policy, it offers no compensating measure of good, however transient. Because while it looks toward a violation of sacred and oft-repeated pledges, it in reality affords no relief to any one.

A short time ago, when the former bill was pending for a final vote, I objected to it as a wide and decisive violation of the principles upon which this Administration came into power, and of the pledges made by the republican party, and I warned gentlemen that these principles were superior to party ties, and were not to be disregarded with impunity. In the few moments allowed to each Senator for debate it was impossible to make more than the general statement. I have endeavored now to show over what mountains of difficulties we must pass, what oft-reiterated promises to the people we must violate to give our votes to a measure like this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of agreeing to the report of the committee of conference. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not think that it was understood that the final vote was now to be taken. There is so much noise caused by the rain falling on the roof, that it is impossible for the Chair to hear what Senators say, or Senators to hear the remarks of the Chair, and I hope the vote will be postponed a few minutes until the question can be understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the roll-call will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. The roll-call will not proceed. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada——

Mr. STEWART. I did not intend to have further proceeded on this remarkable eighth section. I am still of opinion that no comment is adequate to the subject. In the first place, if the promise held out in the first clause thereof is true and to be kept, then all the greenbacks that can be got in must be exchanged for 5 per cent. bonds; and so long as 5 per cent. bonds, which are now at par in gold, are worth more than greenbacks, the persons having greenbacks will exchange them for those bonds if that promise is kept.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me, I will move a recess of the Senate for ten minutes. It is impossible to transact business in the noise caused by the rain falling on the roof.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask this out of courtesy to the Senator from Nevada. I know by experience it is impossible to talk against this tsorm, and I do not think a Senator should be compelled to speak when no one can hear him.

Mr. OGLESBY. We hear the Senator from Nevada without any difficulty.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator know how much difficulty it is for the Senator from Nevada to speak?

Mr. OGLESBY. It may be difficult for him to speak but we can hear him.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask it out of courtesy to him now.

Mr. OGLESBY. All he desires is to be heard; and we hear him here distinctly.

Mr. STEWART. I shall be gratified if the Senator from Illinois will listen and learn something, because on this subject he needs instruction.

Mr. SARGENT. I withdraw the motion because now the storm is subsiding.

Mr. STEWART. I was about to remark that this remarkable eighth section provides that the Government of the United States shall issue a 5 per cent. bond, which is now at par in gold, for as many greenbacks as it can get in, and in order that there shall be a constant supply of greenbacks for the purpose of issuing this bond, it agrees to put out the greenbacks again as fast as it gets them, to keep up the circle. The understanding is that the greenbacks shall be put out again as fast as they come in. The greenbacks are not now worth as much as the bonds, and will not be worth as much as the bonds until they are honored by the Government of the United States. As long as the Government repudiates them, will not receive them for duties, refuses to receive them for its debts, and keeps out the same quantity, of course they will not be as good as gold. The result will be if this thing is allowed to work, it will have to be stopped, I think; but if this machine is allowed to work and does work a little—that every greenback will demand its bond. So long as the greenback is below par (and it will be so long as it is repudiated, and so long as this quantity is out nobody expects it to be up to par) it will be presented at the Treasury to be redeemed in a bond, reissued, taken right up and carried around and presented again. So it will go around the circuit; and as long as there is 1 per cent. in making that little circuit the men concerned will keep it up. Suppose it took four days for the whole mass to go around, there would be 1 per cent. on about $100,000,000 to be made in a day out of the Government. But suppose the whole $400,000,000 got around in a day, what a profit that would be? As long as there is 1 per cent. in it it will be kept up. You do not take up any of your notes; you keep out this redundant amount; you will not receive them for duties; you put out the same amount, for the bill is that the Secretary shall put out the same amount he receives; and of course that will break the Government in a few years, perhaps in a single year. It would break the Government if it did not so depreciate your 5 per cent. bonds that nobody would care for them.

My point is that you cannot redeem the outstanding currency unless you redeem it. Taking in with one hand and putting out with the other in this manner, costing you 5 or 10 per cent. every time you move, will never redeem it. Suppose your greenbacks are worth ninety cents in gold, then there is an inducement of 10 per cent. with the present value of bonds to go and get a bond for the greenback. You put it out again; you keep out the full quantity, and of course you keep it depreciated, and thus you keep up the pressure for the bond. If it works at all, it will break the Government. Talk not to me about this being resumption in 1878. The very time you commence the operation of your machine whereby it works at all, it commences with a destruction of the credit of your Government.

One of two things is true; either the Senate is in favor of resumption of specie payments at some future day absolutely, or it is not. If that be the question, why can it not be plainly put that on a day fixed—let us fix such a day as the majority can agree upon—the Government will pay in coin all its debts, and will demand coin for taxes? Why not fix it right out manfully? You say that it will not have the coin; that we have not got the coin to do it. We have the coin for all the demands we make for coin. We demand that the duties on imports shall be paid in coin, and $200,000,000 of coin per annum is found to do that. There is no difficulty about it. The larger part of your revenue is now paid in coin. Because you use it for that purpose, it comes in. If you said the duties should be paid in greenbacks, there would hardly be any coin in the country in a month. It would all go out if you did not use it. When you demand coin, when you make a use for coin, there is no difficulty in getting it.

But you say here that you will continue to pay the bondholder in coin; you will collect the duties in coin for the purpose of paying the bondholder in coin, but you will continue to make the people use paper. "Coin for the bondholder, depreciated paper for the people;" is that it? Do you not think they understand it? You collect some of your taxes in greenbacks, it is true; but you put a discount on them, and convert them into coin so as to pay the bondholder. Is it not better for the people to know the exact amount they are paying, if they want to pay it into the Treasury and have the discount? I tell you that the people are entitled to good money; the people are as much entitled to good money as the bondholders. They are entitled to the very best kind of money, and they are entitled to the real measure of value. If it is necessary to take the standard of gold to measure the national debt, if you must have gold for that purpose, why not let the people have gold? Why not give gold to the laborer to measure his labor by, and not measure it by an uncertain scale so as to cheat him? These grangers do not know what the difficulty is; they are cheated by this trick; you are printing devices against their labor. Stop running your printing-machines against labor. That is what is the matter. The producers are defrauded by your printing-machines. That is the trouble. Give them a true measure; do not try to regulate it by the power of the steam-press that makes your money; regulate it by something that is certain.

You may say there is not enough gold to measure, and you must therefore do it with paper. Well, how much paper do you want? How much paper will it take? It depends, you say, on the value of that paper; and how are you going to ascertain the value of that paper? By comparing it with gold, of course; and if that paper is only worth one cent on the dollar as compared with gold, if its capacity to buy gold is only one cent on the dollar, then it takes a great deal of it to buy a very little. Suppose it is worth one mill on the dollar, it takes a great deal more; and by and by it takes a cart-load to do it, as it did in the confederate States when it became impossible for a man to carry enough money in his pocket to pay for his breakfast; and while he was counting out the money for his breakfast he would get hungry for his dinner. [Laughter.] You are to give him money enough to cart around in that shape.

Sir, the laboring man, the producer, is entitled to have his product and his labor measured by the same standard of the world that measures your national debt. From him you have got to extract the money to pay the national debt. Give him the money directly; let him have it. The Constitution provides that the United States shall coin the money. Give him such a standard, give him such money as you require frem him. You require it from the consumer and the producer; you require, from the laboring man, gold to pay the interest on your national debt, which is right, which cannot be avoided if we mean to save the national honor; but then give him the same money with which you pay that debt. Do not take two dollars from him and reduce it to one dollar, before you apply it to the payment of the debt. What better off is the laborer? He has to produce a dollar; and in order to get a dollar to pay interest on the debt you tax him one dollar and fourteen cents, because you have to reduce it to gold. All these manipulations he does not understand. Let him know the exact measure. Why do you want so much abstraction, so much mystification, so much printing, so much figuring, so much manipulation between the honest man who toils or produces and the capitalist who receives his interest? On every turn the producer loses, because you resort to an India-rubber scale, crooked devices, which are a cheat and a fraud.

By means of this fluctuating currency millions and millions have been extracted from labor and accumulated in a few years. There never was in this country or any other such a remarkable growth of millionaires as this fluctuating currency has produced. It is true it has produced a great many more paupers than it has millionaires; it has strewn the country with paupers and disappointed men, but it has accumulated money in great centers; it has created the monopolies of which gentlemen here complain. There is no way of strangling these monopolies when you have so much mystification about your finance that nobody understands it but the monopolists, that the common people cannot understand it. There is nothing honest but honesty; there is nothing true but truth; and there is nothing certain but what can be reduced to certainty. Think of the idea of any man undertaking to determine the value of a paper dollar every day! No man in the United States can tell to-day, measured by paper, how much he is worth. He does not try to ascertain it in that way. He cannot tell how much a day's labor is worth. The telegraph every few hours records how values fluctuate, so that in each of the counting-houses in New York, in each broker's shop, and in each merchant's store that has anything to do with gold, there is a telegraphic apparatus from the gold board to the counter. Every place you go, there you see a telegraphic instrument, in order that the merchant may try to keep up with the rapid fluctuations, and you hear it tick, tick every minute. It is necessary for the man of the century to keep a telegraph to find out how things are going in order to keep his head above water. Can every farmer and every granger keep a private telegraph, so as to have the run of this thing, in order to compete and know what labor is worth and what commodities are worth, and how not to get cheated? He must keep the run of the value of gold by means of a private telegraph. Every business man who figures with gold has to be informed as to the condition of things by telegraph, the rate changes so often, and still you say you have a safe and stable currency! Safe and stable, when no man dare make transactions at all unless he looks up the telegraph to see how gold stands and what it is worth every few minutes! Is such a trick, such a device as that a thing to be kept up permanently? That condition of things must destroy the country.

And then the people are to be taught, and taught by argument, that something can be substituted for money that is not money; that printing-presses can do it; that those who are in favor of getting back to money and to certainty are trying to rob them. Then they get up conventions and make platforms in favor of demonetizing money. Is not this false teaching? And then on top of all that is a compromise that the wisest man in the world cannot understand, presented to the Senate for serious consideration. If any two men alive can come to the same conclusion on reading this compromise I should like to see them. I see that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREERY] is listening to me. Do the farmers of Kentucky engage in borrowing and lending money, or buying and selling bonds? If so, I should like them to look at this and say when we are going to resume specie payments, and say what is going to be the value of stocks then. I should like to see one of them figuring over this eighth section to tell what is going to be done by the Government of the United States. No two Senators give it anything like the same construction. This is like the case of that celebrated tyrant who nailed his laws so high that nobody could read them and then executed people for not knowing the law. He was a very distinguished fellow—I forget his name. This machine here saves nailing up. You can lay it around with perfect safety. It is in modern short-hand obscurity. It can be laid all around everywhere and nobody can understand it. I should like to know how you are going to punish the Secretary of the Treasury for not obeying this law, for if it is a law it ought to be obeyed. In the first place you say he shall receive all the greenbacks that come and shall pay out bonds for them. In the next place you say he shall reissue the greenbacks thus received, and in the next place you say that when he reissues them he shall redeem five-twenties with gold. If he has not got the gold to redeem five-twenties how is he going to do it? He cannot receive the notes unless he reissues them; he cannot reissue them unless he buys 5 per cent. bonds, and he has not the gold, he cannot do it. The Secretary may say, "I must obey the first part of the section." If he obeys that and commences receiving the greenbacks and then giving them out for expenses he will have to give them away very soon. If he receives them and keeps them you will have him impeached for that. If he receives them and gives them away he will be impeached for that. If he receives them and pays them out and does not have gold to buy five-twenties, he will have to be impeached for that. What would a Secretary of the Treasury do under that section? I think he might do almost everything and an indictment would not lie. There is not enough certainty in the section upon which to predicate a charge of bad faith, no matter what the section really means.

I say, then, that if we mean that we ever will resume at all, if we mean that we will ever give the people good money, if we mean that there ever shall be a time when they shall know what they get for their day's wages and know what the value of their property is, if there ever shall be a time when the universal standard of values shall be adopted—if we mean that let us say so. If we do not mean that, let us say nothing or say we do not; but do not incorporate into the law a thing that nobody knows what it does. This looks to me like a political platform, and reminds me of what I heard once on a difficult question in know-nothing times. It then seemed to be admitted all around that there was some difficulty about the naturalization laws, and there was great trouble in getting at the thing as to just what should be done. The suggestion was made by members of one party that they put in their platform that they were in favor of a judicious revision of the naturalization laws. It was accordingly unanimously adopted—a judicious revision. Then the speakers went out on the stump, and to those who wanted the naturalization laws to be so fixed that a foreigner should not vote until he was twenty-one years here they said that was a judicious revision. Some thought that a naturalized foreigner should not vote at all, and they said that was a judicious revision. Another thought that the naturalization laws should be repealed so that a man could vote without being naturalized, and he thought that would be a judicious revision. They carried the State on that platform, but never carried it again after that. This thing may run through a campaign in the same way. One fellow will say, "This means contraction; we are going to redeem all the greenbacks at par; it means contraction, and I am in favor of it because it means hard money." If he talks to a hard-money crowd, he will talk in that way. Another fellow will say, "This means that we shall have all the greenbacks reissued; we shall have just as much paper money as we have now, and besides that we have got free banking, and that is expansion to any extent;" and so it will go on. You can talk to any crowd for any purpose about this bill. It seems that this, instead of being a financial proposition, is a political expedient, and that is all there is of it.

I did not intend to make a speech at the time I got up; but it was so stormy at that time that nobody could be heard and I took the floor for the time being because several Senators were out. That is the reason I have been speaking; but getting on the floor and having this thing called to my attention, I could not refrain from making a few suggestions. The theme is prolific, it boils up and will continue to boil up, because this bill speaks every language and looks in every direction, trying to catch a view of all horns of the dilemma, prepared for every emergency, prepared to justify a ferocious speech in favor of national honor or one for national repudiation. It allows either, because it depends on the construction you give to it. I think this can be done for almost any purpose, and as a political platform it is a specimen of genius; but as a financial measure it does not say whether or not we shall get back to specie payments. If that is said it should be said in such unmistakable language that the people will understand it. When that word is said, let it be understood. Do not nail your law up so high that it cannot be read; do not publish it in an unknown tongue; but speak it in the Anglo-Saxon language that after such a day the Government of the United States will pay all its indebtedness in gold coin and will require the people to do the same thing. Let that be said; fix your day and say that day you will be honest; make a fair, square, honest pledge; do not put an "if" or an "and" and put upon the Secretary of the Treasury a thousand incoherent, conflicting duties which he cannot execute and say, "That is a financial scheme; it is expansion in one way and contraction in another; it is what we want to secure an election." Do not do that. Tell the farmers in the blue-grass country that they have got to pay coin and that they shall have good money to do it with, or tell them thay are going to have as much paper as they want, and if they get so much that they have not horses enough to haul it to market to buy their groceries let them go into the printing-press business; tell them one thing or the other; tell them that we must have money to keep up the national honor and pay the bondholder; but that trash is good enough for them, paper is good enough for them, the worth of which nobody knows. Say one thing or the other. Either say, "You, the people of the United States, have no right whatever to have your labor measured by a true measure; you have forfeited the right to exact it; you have forfeited the right to square dealing, and you shall be humbugged by means of a fluctuating currency, and your labor and the products of your labor shall be transferred by unknown means that you cannot understand from you to the money centers and into the hands of the speculators." Say that to them squarely, and say it shall be irredeemable currency until we have destroyed all confidence, until we have broken down all good faith, until we have made this people a race of speculators and we have held out the hope to them that they can have money without earning it, that value grows and is not earned, until we have destroyed their stamina. Let us say that is the purpose, that they shall first be taught to direct their attention to some mode of creating wealth without earning it, until we get them all engaged in that and make a nation of paupers. Does anybody believe that wealth can be created without labor? If so, start the printing-machine on such a people as that; let them figure; send them to conventions to find the best way to make money without earning it, get their attention called that way, keep them on that line if you will. If that is the purpose, to advise the people of the United States to invent a new machine to get wealth without labor, then declare that you are not going to redeem; but if your purpose is that they shall understand once for all that the only road to wealth is by labor, and that the only wealth that this nation has or any other country has is produced by the labor of man, then let them know, however disagreeable it may be, that it is true; and the truth had better be known that there is nothing valuable which is not produced by labor, that the genius of man has never invented any other course to wealth, that all the chemists and philosophers who have attempted to make a substitute for gold have failed, or they have died either by suicide or in the insane asylum after years of toil. The thing is a failure and cannot be done. If you think that is so, if you know that to be so, why do you not give the people good money?

Your monetary affairs were deranged by the accident of war; it was an abnormal condition. Expedients were resorted to which seemed at the time to be necessary in order to preserve national existence; but that time having passed, we have had ten years of peace and prosperity. It is now time to go back to first principles, and realize the fact that labor alone is the source of wealth and that the laborer is no longer to be cheated; that no device shall be printed, no trick shall be played, that shall rob him of the just equivalent of his labor. If that is the purpose let us say it, and let us say it in language that cannot be misunderstood. If gentlemen differ as to the time when this shall be done, let us talk about the day, not use the language of a trick that makes no day. Do not try to shuffle it off. If this bill means resumption of specie payments in 1878, why does it not say so? It would not have taken all these words to say that. It could have been said in three or four lines, and then the people would have read it and understood it; there would not have been a Senator here but what would have had some idea of its meaning, and certainly there would not have been a grangers' convention but would understand it.

But now we have a bill impossible of execution, an arrangement whereby the processes of fleecing the laborer by uncertain mediums of exchange, by uncertain tricks goes on. Do you think this is to be stopped in 1878, with free banking in the mean time and the full volume of greenbacks out and the declaration that they shall stay out? It is nowhere near resumption; it is not looking at resumption; it has not one eye in that direction at all. It is launching the ship upon an ocean of irredeemable paper, and the men are now living who will see, if this policy is pursued, the time in their lives when there will not be a horse in Kentucky strong enough to haul a load of paper sufficient to buy a pound of sugar. A Senator suggests that that was said when the greenbacks were issued; but there is a difference; under the pressure of war you put out greenbacks and declared them a legal tender. You have put in your national platform that they shall be redeemed; you have declared all the time that you would return to specie payments, and the reason why the greenbacks are worth a cent is that the confidence of the people is not given up in your pledges, and they have still some faith in your pledges. That is the reason why they are worth anything; but let it be known that you can make pledges and break them; let it be known that you put in your party platforms a declaration that it is the policy of the nation to return to a specie basis, and yet have your legislation year after year look in another direction; let it be known that the national promise is only made to be broken, and that is the end of your credit, and then it will be that the cart-horse will not be able to haul sufficient of this paper to pay for a breakfast.

It is the faith of the American people and of the nations of the earth that you will redeem, that you will return to specie payments, that you will not be dishonored, that all your credit rests upon. That faith is worth everything to America. It makes her to-day the proudest of nations. The world should have faith in her credit. She has kept her word as to the bonds and has made money by it. She has not kept her word fully as to the greenbacks, and she has lost money by it and she is losing money by it every day. She is disturbing industry; she is exciting the people to the discussion of this question, holding out hopes that cannot be realized; and we are now to decide whether or not national honor shall be preserved, whether good faith shall be maintained, whether the poor as well as the rich shall have a certain measure of value, whether the poor man is entitled to have a dollar of gold to measure his labor as well as the millionaire to measure the interest on his bonds. That is the question, and that is the question the people will discuss. It stands thus: America has redeemed her faith to the millionaire. She takes from the laboring man his toil but she takes it with an uncertain measure; she takes it with a swindling measure; she takes it to pay the millionaire. Let her give to the laboring man, to the producer, a certain measure; let her treat him as she treats the bondholder. Give him money so that you cannot discount him; give him real money. That is what he wants.

This issue has been before the country before. It was one of the grand old issues once of the democratic party. They had grangers in those days, and the question was then seriously discussed whether the poor man was entitled to have a good dollar. That was discussed all around. The great old predecessor of my friend from Missouri discussed here time and again whether a poor man was entitled to a good dollar, and they returned him to the Senate on that issue just as often as he wanted to come, until some other issue arose. So it was with all the great leaders of thirty or forty years ago. The people, when they understand that it is necessary in order to defend themselves, in order to get the real value of their productions, to have money that they understand, money that they can count, money that they can compare with other things and know that they are not mistaken, will be for honest money. When that question is put to them, and when they understand it (and they will understand it, for they are not less intelligent now than they were thirty years ago; they will understand before this battle is over,) they will decide it. I do not care whether it is decided here or not; it cannot be patched up. They will decide whether they will have good money. You may put as many bills that are so obscure that they cannot be understood, as you please, upon the statute-book; you may nail them seventy feet high; you may nail them on the dome of the Capitol and take away the ladder; you may do all that and you may compromise, but as long as the sharpers and the wealthy have to keep a special telegraph to keep the run of this thing, the people will discuss it.

Look at the expense you put them to. Every man in Kentucky will have to have a private telegraph and a telegraph operator to keep it running, so as to know the value of his labor. That is a little extravagant; but if he does not do it, the fellow in the broker's shop will have the advantage of him and will fix up games in dealing with this uncertain thing, to rob him as he is now doing. There is no doubt about it. If you are going to have a currency that fluctuates with every wind in New York, you must give every man a telegraph so that he can find out where he stands.

This thing cannot be compromised, and there is no use in talking about bringing in compromise measures. We either mean one thing or the other. We either mean specie payments or we mean irredeemable currency. Let us say one thing or the other. A bill ought not to be so obscure that half a dozen of the leading Senators at least do not understand it alike. There ought to be one or two that could understand the bill you pass. The only evidence I have of what this bill means is what I am told, and I believe that is the only evidence any Senator has except he who prepared it. One man tells me one story and another another, and whom am I to believe? That is the kind of legislation we are to adopt as a compromise! We are to shut our eyes and "go it blind," and take something we cannot understand. We might as well have our eyes shut all the time. We are to do something that nobody can explain or tell what it means. We have to employ translators. I should like to know what language it is in. Who can interpret it? It would cost millions on millions of dollars for Senators to interpret this law. Different constructions can be put upon it in the Treasury Department, and it will be a source of more investigation than all your Sanborn contracts and your District governments and all the other things you are investigating. All sorts of things may be done under it, and then the question is whether they are done right. It is the most prolific of all things for discussion; and no matter what the Secretary of the Treasury does he has to answer to an investigating committee as to whether he did right. And then when you come to the investigating committee, when they get all the evidence, can they agree? There cannot any two of them agree what it means. Then there will be a great fight in the newspapers as to whether he has done right or wrong. Now, why not say to the Secretary of the Treasury something that he can read and understand? I do not profess to be much of an adept in language, but I know enough to understand what plain words mean.

I want to make a suggestion to the Chair. When I get through I hope the discussion will not cease, but I trust that one Senator after another will get up and tell us what this bill means, and then I should like to have the Chair make a general average and see what he makes out of that. [Laughter.]

Suppose you pass a resolution saying this is sound financial policy, and we indorse the policy of Congress on financial questions as sound, truthful, and go out with that, and then I should like to know what it means. Suppose some one in a crowd to whom that resolution was proposed should get up and take out a greenback and ask, "What is that worth?" and then I should like to hear you explain what that will be worth in 1878. "What can I get for it in 1878 if I keep it that long? And how can I keep the run of the little joker until that time? Will it be necessary for me to have a pocket telegraph to keep the run of it? How can I follow it through all its windings to know what it is worth any day? What am I going to get for it in 1878 if there is to be an auction? How can I follow it?" That is to be the question. There is no use laughing about this thing. We may fool each other a little here, but we are not fooling anybody else. We are not going to fool the people. We are not going to allay the excitement. The question never will be settled until you determine the simple question whether the laboring man is entitled to have a gold dollar if he earns it, or whether you are going to cheat him with something else. That is the upshot of the whole thing. The people will hold right on to that, and they will come to the conclusion, "I am entitled to just as good money as my neighbor," and to that party they will all finally come until it will get to be a big party. It was a little party in England once, but it grew wonderfully. It has been a little party in this country occasionally, but under Silas Wright, Tom Benton, and Calhoun, and others, it grew to be the party of the country. The whig party had to adopt it and put it into their platform in order to get along at all. Everybody had to say that the laboring man was entitled to a good dollar. That was fought over. They will fight it over again and the same party will win. There have been a great many battles fought against gold and gold has won every time. Gold never has compromised. The idea of trying to compromise whether gold shall be respected or not! You say you have got up a compromise bill on the question whether gold shall be respected. Gold has made the world respect it all the time.

The English people once thought they could get along without gold for awhile, but they had to go back to it. We did not depart from it on purpose to disgrace gold; but we attempted expedients at the time of the war because we thought we had not enough gold in the country to get along with, though probably we had. We did it not because we had any prejudice against gold. When the legal-tender law was adopted look at the debates; no man ever disparaged gold; no man pretended that anything else could be substituted as a permanent thing in its place; but all said it was necessary to do this to save the nation. They did not insult gold in their arguments at that time. But now we find conventions resolving that gold is not money. There is really something behind that. The people who hold these conventions are dissatisfied, but they have not found out what hurts them. The fact is that what ails them is that they have not got gold; they have not received gold for their labor and are poor. They have been cheated. That is what ails them. What ails the people of the West? They have been cheated out of their products. By your devices and tricks they have been cheated out of their labor and their products by the manipulators of currency who keep private telegraphs in their offices and keep their hands on the throat of the producer. They will find it out in time. They will find out that what ails them is that they have not received in gold the value of their labor; and by means of a depreciated currency they have been compelled to build up colossal monopolies and great fortunes. They will find that out in time.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Gold is the basis of monopoly.

Mr. STEWART. Gold the basis of monopoly! Paper is the basis of poverty, the basis of fraud, the basis of cheating, and I should like to know who through paper has grown rich. I might name them, but I will not, because it would be invidious, and they had a right to take advantage of your legislation. I might name fifty men in the city of New York who are now millionaires in consequence of your depreciated currency by their speculations in gold and currency. I might name them, but I cannot name a farmer in the West who has become rich by being paid in greenbacks and being compelled to pay for what he had to buy on the gold basis. We are dealing on a gold basis for everything we buy from Europe. You pay the farmer greenbacks, and when he buys his sugar or his coffee he buys it on a gold basis. Coffee and sugar are bought in the West Indies or South America and imported, and whatever article a man purchases of foreign production is purchased on a gold basis; the duties are paid in gold. The farmer receives greenbacks and must pay gold prices for what he uses. This manipulation has made him poor, and as long as the manipulation goes on the farmer of the West will be poor. He never can get rich until he deals in a kind of currency that he himself can calculate. While he has got to trust to a man who has a telegraph in his office he is going to be swindled. You must give him a money that he himself can count and know the value of. Nobody will take care of him. Your grangers will all be for hard money after awhile. They will come to the conclusion that they are as good as anybody and entitled to as good money, entitled to understand it, and they prefer to count it themselves to let anybody else count it for them.

If this was a new thing, if it was the first time that a country ever undertook to cheat itself and its people, to make them believe they could get some other measure of value besides money, we might think that the genius of the American people could do this thing; but it is not the first time; it has been tried too often and always failed, and it will fail now. All I have to say to this bill is that it proposes to fix the date of returning to specie payments, with the absurdity, inconsistency, and uncertainty of unlimited expansion in the mean time. It can certainly be construed into unlimited expansion, raising false hopes, disorganizing, demoralizing the finances of the country. If it was a square proposition that in 1878 we should return to specie payments, there would be something in it. I think that is too far off; but you had better put it at 1890 than adopt this. You had better do nothing than do this; because this would hold out hopes for unlimited expansion. It will do for the speculators. It will set the wits of those men to work to know how they can further by means of devices rob labor of its just reward. It will set them to work to know how they can speculate in gold and in bonds, how they can take from the hard-earned toil of the people a percentage in some way under this bill. I presume that the money dealers are looking over this bill to-day to see how it will let them swindle the Government or the producer. It is uncertain as to the way it is going to be operated, and the influences to be brought on the Secretary of the Treasury to make him do this or that. The speculators are looking to see how under it they can continue their traffic of accumulating wealth from the toil of others; they are studying this bill to-day. Put it in language so that the toiler can understand it. If you mean to redeem, let it be so that all who can read and write can understand it. Do not put it in this language, leaving it to this uncertainty, and say it is a compromise!

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I shall not make more than an observation or two, and that simply to explain the reasons why I shall not find it consistent with my own notions to vote for this proposition.

It must be apparent to everybody who has witnessed the debates upon the subject of our financial condition since the commencement of this Congress, that there must be some principal fact on which we are not agreed. It cannot be a matter of sentiment, I think; certainly it cannot be a matter of special interest. From the time Congress came together to the present moment, we have not divided here according to our party affiliations; we have not divided according to our personal convictions altogether, but quite independent of party divide very much as we represent sections. Reflecting the views of the communities we represent, so we divide in the Senate. Of course we accord to each other perfect integrity of purpose, equal intelligence, and equally patriotic motives in a desire to reach the best possible solution of a great question, the greatest question before the American people, and as great a question touching the economical condition of a people as can ever be presented to a people. And under the peculiar circumstances of the condition of the nation, its great debt—national debt—the debts of the several States, the debts of the municipal communities, considering the magnitude of American indebtedness, no time in our history was so grave for the consideration of this question as the present.

Of course a diversity of opinion conflicting as it is here and tending to radical changes, is a matter to be deprecated, a matter to be deplored; but it exists. It is for us to account for it and to govern ourselves accordingly as best we can. Now, let us ascertain if we can what is the principal fact underlying our deliberations here and which stands in the way of an agreement among ourselves. What is that principal fact which divides the Senate and Congress and has divided us these many months, and which divides the communities, which puts a class of communities on one side radically of a great question, and another class of communities on another side, and consequently their representatives here in the same position. Well, sir, this I am disposed to consider the principal fact: Do or do we not really need more irredeemable paper currency? Perhaps it might be more felicitously stated, but I understand that to be the principal fact.

A class of communities being a majority on this floor and in the other House of Congress and a majoriy of the American people unquestionably entertain the idea to-day, and have these many months that they really need, the country needs, a larger volume of irredeemable paper money; not that they prefer irredeemable paper to money itself, but they associate with money irredeemable paper, and as the circumstances of the times are capable of nothing else, they demand that. That is the exigent demand. There is no compromise on that. Hardly a Senator stands here from certain communities who does not demand that. No Representative representing those communities in the other House of Congress but demands so much more money of this class. That is the great fact which underlies all our debates. That is the great fact which divides us. That is the great fact which divides the American communities to-day.

The question is, is that demand sound? That the people demand it whether it is sound or not is not to be denied. There is no doubt about that fact; but is it true that the American people need more irredeemable money? Mr. President, independent of what the American people think upon that subject, standing here as their representatives, it is our bounden duty to pass our judgment on that question, and no matter what they think, unless we feel that we are instructed directly to vote according to their notions, we are bound to exercise our own judgment upon that principal fact in this case. Does not the speculative but the legitimate business of this country demand an increase of the volume of paper money at this time? My honorable friend who sits beside me, [Mr. MORTON,] for whom I entertain the profoundest respect, believes it to be so. He has asserted and maintained it with great plausibility and power in argument from the assembling of Congress until the present time, but it is only an argument after all. There stands the fact; what is the evidence that we need it? Tell me, sir, why we need a larger volume of currency to-day when the business of the country is stagnant than we did when it was in the full tide of successful experiment any year within the last ten years? How is that? Have we not seen a superabounding prosperity since 1866; since the close of the war and the reconstruction policy of the Government? Was the nation ever more prosperous? Have we not seen the most gigantic enterprises, involving millions and hundreds of millions and going up to billions, carried prosperously forward, no man dreaming that a greater volume of paper currency was necessary? Nay, sir, in the presence of all these facts have not those who have been cognizant of these facts, including my honorable friend on my right, [Mr. MORTON,] all argued that what we wanted was not more paper money, but a paper money that should be equivalent to gold?

Congress in both branches has resolved it; the sentiment of the people everywhere has demanded it; the legislation of Congress has been predicated upon that one single fact. Nay more, when our speculative enterprises, legitimate enterprises, business of all kinds, were in their palmiest days from 1866 down to last September, nobody dreamed that you wanted a larger volume of paper money; nobody demanded it; nobody thought of it. Now, sir, in an hour of adversity, when there is a stagnation in business affairs, we dream that what we want is more paper money.

Mr. President, does anybody believe that more paper money is a remedy for this difficulty? It was that we did not in season make haste to return to a currency which should be equivalent to gold that brought us into this predicament. It was the fact that we had a larger volume of paper currency than the actual business necessities of the country required which led us into those gigantic schemes and speculations which were unproductive and which produce no results to-day; and now when we have fallen upon severe times in business affairs we lack the credits which ought to have come from those grand schemes, and lacking them, we have not the credits which enable us to obtain the money to float those schemes.

Let me illustrate in another way. The western communities as a general proposition think they want more paper currency. The eastern and middle communities as a general proposition think they have got more than they know what to do with, and they have as a matter of fact. The money centers to-day are stagnant. Money was never more abundant and never cheaper. How is that? On the one hand you perceive that there is an unqualified testimony of a superabundance of money at all the money centers in the East and in the Middle States. Why, then, is there not the same abundance of money in the West that there has been in previous years? Simply because the enterprises of the West have failed, simply because the West cannot inspire the capital of the East to invest in their enterprises. If the West had the same promises of return, and if they had the same credits and the same balances of credits, they could obtain money as cheap now as in any of the past twelve years.

Mr. HOWE. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. He is drawing a contrast between the financial condition of the East and West that does not strike me to be entirely just; but it is not to that point that I desire to call his attention now. I understand him to assert that in the East as contradistinguished from the West there is a superabundance of money and that money is extremely cheap. Will the Senator be good enough to inform the Senate why they do not dispose of their money by putting it into Eastern enterprises, or investing it in Eastern real estate; and will he be good enough to state in that connection if it be not the fact that real estate in the East has declined as much in price or value as money itself has?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly; and that is exactly on the line of the general proposition that there is a general stagnation in business affairs all over the country. Business has been overdone. Human enterprise under the excitement of this paper money, combined with the general order of things in the last fifteen years, has been pushed to the very extreme of human endeavor, and we are suffering the natural, irresistible effect of it. That is just what it is; nothing more, nothing less. The idea of saying that it is because we are not floated on a superabundance of paper money to my mind is utterly fallacious. I account for it from natural causes. Of course the East is involved in it just as much as the West; times are dull everywhere unquestionably, and it is the natural result of an overexcitement in business affairs for the last twelve or fifteen years.

Mr. HOWE. But how does it happen that when money in the East has become so very cheap and worthless you cannot get more real estate for it than you could when money was very high and in demand everywhere?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How does it happen that they do not? Does the Senator understand that?

Mr. HOWE. I do not exactly understand it. I do not know but that I could find it out if the Senator would explain it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not maintained that they cannot. Does not the Senator know that in all periods of this kind money is timid? Does he not know that the holders of money do not care to invest? The Senator certainly must know the fact that at all the great business and money centers money never was easier and cheaper than at the present time on call on such securities as the money-lender will take. That is undoubtedly so; but it is also undoubtedly true that all over the country there is a stagnation in business, and it is just as true that up to last September nobody dreamed of any such thing. It came upon us in a day. Lack of confidence, as some say, is the general cause operating; but no matter what the cause, there is the general fact; and it is idle in my friend to say that it is produced by the lack of a volume of irredeemable paper; nor do I think that it forebodes such utter ruin as seems to be inferred by certain Senators. I do not think it will hurt the American people if they are obliged to pause in their career, if for the next ten years we invest less money in speculative and unproductive enterprises. I believe that if we should invest less millions in unproductive railways for the next ten years the people of this country would be benefited. I believe if this were a chastisement, if it could be appropriated by the American people as a chastisement for their excesses in individual expenditures and expenditures of States and the nation so that we should pause in fast living and fast expenditure, it would be for the advantage of coming generations as well as the improvement of the present.

Mr. President, if I believed that we needed more irredeemable paper money, that that was a remedy for the evils under which we are supposed to groan, I certainly should vote for this proposition; but as I do not think so, as I think we want to make the paper we have equivalent to gold and so begin to recognize that we have a standard of values that the substantial prosperity which the people of this country have a right to have will never come until the time arrives when we have a standard of value, I cannot of course vote for increasing the present volume of paper money. I postpone the day of free banking to the time when every dollar issued shall be the equivalent of specie. Then I am ready to welcome free banking—free banking anywhere, free banking everywhere; but until that time comes, my own judgment about it is that it is a peril, a peril to the public interests.

Upon this assumption, Mr. President, you will see that my belief is that the great duty of this Congress is to take a step toward specie payments that will produce specie payment; and as nobody denies that this proposition is inflation, it is impossible for me to vote for it. Glad as I should be to see some arrangement of this question, some adjustment of it in some way which would be satisfactory and would lead in the end to probably beneficial results, I cannot see my way clearly to vote for this bill.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President, during this debate and on a prior occasion when the same subject was before the Senate, the people I have the honor in part to represent as well as the other States on the Pacific coast, where gold and silver coin has been adhered to as the measure of values, have been alluded to seemingly in reproachful terms, as if we had been guilty of doing grievous wrong to the nation in not accepting the Treasury notes—the greenback currency—and adopting it as the measure of value instead of gold and silver. In other words, because we have adopted the gold and silver coin of the United States as our standard and measure of value, our patriotism in that regard is impeached and found less valuable, measured in gold, than it would be if measured in the paper currency, legal tender so called; and while listening to the debates on this floor I have sometimes had doubts whether it was yet understood that the gold and silver coin of the United States was lawful coin or a legal tender. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. This has been done and is being done in the national mints even at this day, and gold and silver is legal tender as regulated by law. When a short time since I arrived in this city from the State I have the honor to represent, where gold is the circulating medium, and not yet being supplied with that better known and so-called better money, which is the circulating medium here, I had occasion to make a small purchase on the avenue, and took out a five dollar gold piece and offered it to the seller in payment. He looked at me, as I thought, a little suspiciously, and apologetically remarked that the money might be good but that they were not very well acquainted with that kind of money here, and he preferred not to receive it. Shortly after I had taken my seat in the Senate I heard my State alluded to by Senators in reproachful terms as if we were wanting in patriotism, had been guilty of a wrong to the nation and had retarded our own prosperity by shutting out the greenback and adhering to gold as our measure of value.

Now, sir, I have no desire to enter at any length on this debate, but I wish to say a few words in behalf of California and her true position in regard to the currency. Hitherto I have on every occasion voted against measures calculated to postpone the return to specie payments. So I shall continue to vote, as I have seen no disposition manifested on the part of the dominant party by this or any measure calculated to bring about such a desideratum, or in fact any beneficial results to the nation by improving the condition of the currency. The purpose hitherto as manifested by the majority seems to be a determination to increase the volume of the currency and to avoid a return to a specie basis. And yet we have only to refer to California and other States to illustrate how easily such a purpose may be accomplished. According to my judgment no beneficial results will follow the adoption of this measure recommended by the committee. I do not question the motives of the Senators who have reported it. I am willing to concede they believe it to be for the best; but it is a temporizing policy, postponing by legislation the day of resumption so far in the future that it will have no wholesome restraining influence on reckless financial ventures, or create any fear but what legislation will again interpose to extend the period long before the day fixed for resumption shall be reached. Imperative necessity will demand this, and imperative necessity is always ready at hand on great emergencies.

But, sir, as I said, my purpose was to speak in regard to my own people and the position that we have taken on this currency question in practice. At the time the constitution of the State of California was adopted there was placed in it an inhibition against any banks of issue. At the time that the paper legal-tender was authorized and issued as such we had no paper currency. We had banks of deposit and discount, but no banks issuing notes as currency. Our position was so remote from the commercial and financial centers on this side, that the bank-notes of the Atlantic States never entered into our circulation, and were never introduced among us for such purpose. When the Treasury notes were proclaimed as legal-tender, the question arose whether we would adhere to the production of our soil, gold and silver, as our standard, or to the new measure of value—the legal-tender. At that time we had no railroad communication; our position was remote and isolated, and we could not keep posted on the currency fluctuations of New York. By the voluntary act of the people—there was no compulsion or attempt at compulsion—they preferred the solid and substantial, the constitutional coin of the country to the ever-changing and fluctuating paper currency. Fortunate for us, as we think, was the determination.

And now, sir, what has been the result, and especially to us? We have something by which the value of property is measured which, of itself, is intrinsically valuable. What is the result here with currency? You have something by which the value of property is measured which has only a relative value. The one, gold, our circulating medium, has an intrinsic value; the other, your paper, has a relative value. One is substance, the other shadow. One is a solid reality, the other an unsubstantial nothing if disconnected from its pedigree. The one pays itself, the other must look to some one to pay for it. Of what value is the greenback except as you may estimate its market value in gold? Of itself, none. Of what value is the twenty-dollar gold piece? It bears upon its face the impress of sovereignty. It has the value marked as required by the Constitution. It has the authority of law. Is it disloyal to make it our measure? You have yours. You like it, we do not. Our gold coin is good here; it is good in London or in Paris, because it is intrinsically worth what it purports to be and what is marked upon its face. You may take it with you from here to England and France and it is as current there as it is here. You take the greenback there and it is of no value. It is a float, a waif, depending upon an indefinite promise to be performed by somebody against whom you have no power to enforce it. It is not money that may be properly so called, because it has no equivalent and intrinsically has no value by which the value of anything else may be ascertained.

It results in this, and in this respect the nation has made a great mistake: that either this money, so called, intrinsically valuable must be adopted as the standard, or that which is relatively valuable must be adopted as the standard. You cannot make both the standard because they are not equivalents. They march in parallel lines; the greenback here, the gold there. As long as there is a difference between them in value, they never will come together. As the greenback is depreciated, they are in diverging lines. The natural result must follow that either one or the other must be an article of merchandise. You have made the gold and silver on this side the article of merchandise and adopted the greenback as the standard of value. We on the Pacific coast have adopted the more substantial thing, the gold and silver coin of the nation, as the measure of value and made the greenback the article of merchandise. Now, then, we will place ourselves upon these platforms and have our patriotism measured accordingly. Ours is the coined money of the Constitution, yours the creature of the Congress. We do not complain of your choice; leave us to our preferences.

Now, sir, suppose that you should do in the Atlantic States as we have done on the Pacific coast, make the greenback the article of merchandise, and the gold and silver the measure and standard of value. Then we would at once be brought to the footing of specie payments, inasmuch as value would be estimated by that which is valuable. But with the legal-tenders as your measure of value, property must necessarily fluctuate in proportion. Property in California, notwithstanding all the fluctuations here, has remained stationary, except so far as the general prosperity of the country has advanced it, while on this side property has advanced perhaps 50 or 100 per cent., because the fluctuations in the legal-tender has been to that extent. At such prices the sellers are many, the purchasers few.

I remember being in New York in 1864, when the fluctuations in legal-tenders amounted to 20 or 30 per cent. in the course of a day. Necessarily, those who had goods to sell had to raise their prices in proportion. Necessarily, real estate rose in proportion. Necessarily, the bills even at the hotels rose in proportion; and they got keyed up to that high standard, that they have never from that day to this been able to reduce them to what they were anterior to the introduction of the greenback as the measure of value.

I do not undertake to say that it was impolitic on the part of the nation or that it was unpatriotic, or that it was in violation of the Constitution, because the Supreme Court have decided that Congress were justified, not by the letter of the Constitution, but as a war measure, in making the legal-tender what it is.

In addition to the legal-tender currency, so-called, we have the national-bank system, which has a relation to it and a connection with it—a system of banking the best for the banker that ever was devised; the most pernicious for the people that ever was put in practice. The banker takes his United States bond payable in gold, deposits it with the Treasurer, receives his interest upon it payable in gold, and receives in addition thereto 90 per cent. of notes which pass current, which he loans, thus imposing upon the people that double taxation, the interest upon the bonds and the interest upon the money that the banks receive from the Government, which they loan to the people. This money—the legal-tender, so called, and the notes issued by the national-banks—is pronounced here by the friends of that currency as the best that the world ever saw; and yet it measures nothing. We are told that it is better than any gold or silver coin, better than the notes of the Bank of England, which are at a premium in the city of New York, better than those of the Bank of France; that it is in fact the best currency the world ever saw or ever knew; and yet, with its fluctuations, all kinds of property must proportionately fluctuate, and whenever any man makes a purchase he must encounter that risk which was so well illustrated by the argument of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] and which no member upon this floor has successfully answered.

I do not intend to discuss this matter to any extent; but to make money valuable at all it must bring us in relation with the commercial world. If it be of no value to us in our relations with the commercial world, it is not a medium of exchange or a medium to estimate values. If money, as I said, fluctuates, all property must fluctuate with it, and so long as our money is at a discount and below what the commercial world recognizes as a medium of values, so long it will be useless in our intercommunication with the commercial world.

But we have been told as a reason for the kind of legislation that has been attempted to be enforced upon the Senate that the South and West require additional money, currency, so called; as if money was property, was wealth, was capital that could be transferred by legislation; as if it were some intangible, unsubstantial thing that could be transferred from the city of New York, west or south without the intervention of an express-wagon. I do not so understand it. No legislation can make the greenback any more valuable than it is in the market, and no legislation can transfer it from the East to the West, so as to make it valuable there, unless the capital is there to take the place of the amount that may be transferred. To suppose you can accomplish such results or make the depreciated Government Treasury note the equivalent of Government coin is a fallacy that never has been and never will be true, and neither eloquence, logic, or sophistry can demonstrate to the contrary.

Mr. President, as I said before, I look upon the measure before the Senate as a mere temporizing policy. It effects no beneficial results; it restores no confidence in the community; it makes no more value to the greenback, so called, as a legal tender. If I had the control of the Senate, if I represented the majority here, I would offer a proposition which I think in three lines would accomplish the very purpose the whole country would desire to see effected. It would be substantially as follows:

That on and after the 4th day of July, 1876, nothing but the gold and silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender for public or private debts.

Pass an act in those few words, let it go into force on that centennial celebration day, and you will accomplish the very purpose that the whole people would like to see accomplished, and you will get rid of this entire discussion. In my opinion the whole people would rejoice if you should adopt legislation of that character. That is the remedy that I would propose, as I stated, if I had the power in the Senate to accomplish that purpose. By that simple enactment, to go into effect on our hundredth anniversary, the nation would be born again, and brought back to reason, intelligence, and prosperity.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I want to save the Senate from fainting by promising them in the outset that I am not going to make a speech. I rise to say that if I understand the report of the committee of conference I am going to vote for its adoption by the Senate. I think I am bound to do one thing more than that, and that is to tender my thanks, whatever they may be worth, to the committee of conference for the result of that deliberation of theirs which they have laid before the Senate.

I suppose my general attitude on this question of finance is as well understood by the Senate as it ever will be. So I shall not attempt to expound or explain or to state it again. I desire to say a word, however, in reply to some of the remarks I have heard made here. I have not had the pleasure of listening to the whole debate, but only a very small portion of it. To those Senators who have arraigned this report as an attempt to expand the paper money of the country I say that either they misunderstand the report or I misunderstand it. I think it is a proposition to contract the paper money of the country, and I greet it with all my heart, because it is the first proposition of the kind I have heard in the Senate from any responsible quarter since paper money was introduced into the circulation of the country.

What the paper money of the country is to-day you know. It is just $382,000,000, no more, no less; and the first praise I bestow on this bill is that it is at last a law which says you shall never have any more than $382,000,000 of paper money in this country. I see my honorable friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] shakes his head. I may be mistaken about that. I know there has been a dispute in the Senate as to what the law did say on that point; but while I admit there are those here who have insisted that under the law as it stood you could not have but $356,000,000 of paper money in circulation, there are other Senators, whose opinions are entitled to some consideration at least if not to as much, who have insisted that under the law the volume of paper money might be $400,000,000. That dispute is ended by this bill. If this bill becomes a law, we shall know that you can have but $382,000,000 of paper money in circulation at the outside.

This is not the chief merit of this proposition, in my judgment. Its chief merit is that it provides a method by which from time to time, just as fast as business and capital see fit to do it, this volume of paper money may be diminished down to a certain point. I cannot pass by this moment without saying that I heartily regret that the bill should propose that limitation upon contraction; that the bill should have proposed a limit beyond which this volume of paper money should not be contracted; but it is here, and I am not going to repudiate the bill simply because that feature is in it. I am one of those who would rather see this country doing business with a volume of $300,000,000 of paper money than with a volume of $382,000,000 of paper money. I am one of those, and I have sometimes thought I was the only one of the kind in the Senate who really felt that paper money was one of those anomalies, one of those outrages upon common sense, a dollar of which ought not to be tolerated in any business community.

I know, Mr. President, that under the operation of this bill other kinds of paper, not money, may be issued. I am aware that this bill proposes to authorize banks to issue their notes beyond the limit now fixed for bank-note circulation. The Senator from Massachusetts will not insist, I think no Senator here will insist, that that is an expansion of the paper money. We have none of us become so heedless of definitions as to speak of a bank-note as money. We have come to regard the promise of the Government as money. The law commands us to respect it as money; but a bank-note, which is a promise to pay money, is no more money than my note, it is no more money than a bank-check; and the business interests of the country are no more in danger by the multiplication of such promises, unless they are multiplied beyond the ability of the banks to perform the promise, than those same business interests are injured by the multiplication of any other commercial paper whatever. Under your law there is but one contingency which can possibly arise when every one of these bank-notes, whether they be $500,000,000 or $5,000,000,000, may not be and must not be converted into money—not coin, but money, what your statute says is money. What is that contingency? It is the contingency when the bonds of the nation, which are deposited as security for the conversion of every one of these bank-notes, will not afford money, either in the form of a greenback or coin, in exchange for all these notes.

I have once said in the Senate, and I want to repeat while I regret to-day as I have regretted heretofore, that you would not allow a larger retirement of greenbacks than that proposed by this bill, I wish to reaffirm once more, that while the security of the people for the conversion of every bank-note either into coin or greenbacks will be ample, as ample under the operations of this bill as it is under the laws to-day, the value of that commodity, so to speak, or of that money, as your law terms it, into which it is convertible, will be constantly appreciating under the operation of this bill; for you cannot issue a million of bank-notes without diminishing the quantity of that money into which they are convertible, without, as I say, lessening the security for the actual payment, and every dollar of that money into which the note is convertible is made more valuable. The value of that money is constantly increased in proportion as the diminution in its quantity goes on. Therefore, unless the security which the banks deposit fails, and it cannot fail until not merely congressional faith but Government bonds are at a discount, not only is your money growing better as it takes its flight, but your bank-paper is increasing in value.

Mr. President, I have no issue with my friends here in the Senate to-day who talk about the beauties or the blessings of hard money. I believe it is the only real commercial money there is or can be. I have said that before; I reiterate it to-day. It is commerce, the judgment of the business world, which gives the true character of money. Political institutions do something in that direction, but a very uncertain thing. They do sometimes stamp a given coin as having a certain value. Unfortunately for the last twelve years under our institutions we have learned to stamp a similar value on a piece of paper which intrinsically has no value at all. I believe that coin is the only true money. I echo every sentiment which I have heard here in its praise.

The difference between me and those who have been singing its praises since this debate has arisen I think is just this: that while they are ready to sing hosannas to the beauties of that kind of money, with the exception of here and there an individual, I have found no disposition anywhere to take a step toward its introduction. I have excepted individuals. I want to except a particular individual. My honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] who does me the honor to listen to me now has proposed one expedient which he really believed would take us toward that kind of money; and I almost agree with him, nay, I quite agree with him. That it would take us toward it on pleasant and safe paths, I am not entirely assured; but it meant that and no other. He is not alone in the Senate on that ground.

But I think among all the multiplied measures which have been proposed here there have been but few of them which really meant to lead us back to what you call a specie basis, and those very few I think have received but very feeble support in the Senate. The measure now before the Senate does propose to take us in that direction. I know we go very slowly. I think we go more considerately than we ought to go; but I had rather go in that direction slowly than not go at all; and for that reason, Mr. President, I have concluded, unless I shall be convinced that this bill means something which I do not see in it, to give it my hearty and cordial support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] has been called suddenly away on account of sickness in his family, and I agreed to pair with him on this question. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. KELLY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were present he would vote in the affirmative, and I would vote in the negative.

Mr. BAYARD. My colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] is paired on this question with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] My colleague would vote "nay" and Mr. WINDOM would vote in the affirmative, if present.

Mr. WADLEIGH. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEWIS.] If he were present he would vote in favor of the report, and I should vote against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Washburn—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gordon, Kelly, Lewis, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wadleigh, and Windom—18.

So the report was concurred in.

Mr. RANSOM subsequently said: I desire to state that I was momentarily absent from the Chamber when the vote was taken on concurring in the report of the committee of conference on the currency bill. I requested the Senator from Indiana to send for me in case the vote should be taken, which he did promptly, but I was not able to return in time. I desire to record my vote in favor of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule forbids that. The Senator cannot record his vote after the result has been announced.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3094, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 19.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. While the doors are being closed I desire to say a word. I gave way yesterday with the understanding, on my part, that the business which I had the permission of the Senate to go on with, bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, should be taken up immediately after this conference report was concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am entirely unable to hear the Senator from Illinois. I rise to the point of order that we should have order restored so that we can hear what the Senator is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appeals to Senators to resume their seats and avoid conversation.

Mr. LOGAN. I was stating that I gave way yesterday for the reason that I could not refuse to do it, although the day was set apart to the Military Committee, being the third time that I had to give way for other business. I ask the Senate now to consent, as soon as we come out of executive session, that the first business in order shall be the business of the Military Committee that is on the Calendar, in pursuance of the agreement we have had for three different days. I think I have acted rather generously. I have given away three days that have been set apart for the bills of my committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent, after the conclusion of executive business, that the Senate will proceed to consider the bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is the Senator aware that on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] the post-office appropriation bill was taken up?

Mr. LOGAN. I was not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will not occupy a great deal of time. If we take up that bill and continue it, as I hope we shall, we can dispose of it in a short time. It is the only appropriation bill which the Committee on Appropriations will be in a condition to present to the Senate for several days, and when it is disposed of, Senators having other bills in charge will have ample time to call them up while the committee is considering the sundry civil bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to make this statement and appeal to the Senate: I am compelled to leave Washington City on business. I have been waiting here for a week. I ought to have gone a week ago on business of great importance to me, a matter I cannot defer any longer. I stated on the first day I made this request that I desired this because I should be compelled to leave the city, and that is my reason now. If it were not for that I would let this business take its chances the same as anything else.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How much time would the Senator be content with?

Mr. LOGAN. I think we can get through with all these bills in a few hours if there is no discussion upon them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Would the Senator take from one o'clock until three, to-morrow?

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to have time to get through, but still I will take whatever the Senate will give me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So far as I am concerned, if that will satisfy the Senator, I think we can pass the appropriation bill after that time.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not pass it this evening? I am willing to stay here and do business.

Mr. WEST. I suggest to the Senator that he had better not take the chances of having his bill come up after the passage of the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is any understanding arrived at in regard to the business of the Military Committee?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Military Committee have the time required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the pending bill be postponed for the purpose of proceeding to consider the bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to make this suggestion, without any interest in this matter except a general interest. If the Senator from Illinois will move to take up the business of the Military Committee at any time he pleases, I think the Senate will stand by him and get it up, and he can do better I think in that way than by having any more agreements. The Senator has had three days, as he says, assigned to him, and he has given way every time. Now, if he gets another agreement, very likely somebody will come in and there will be another delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has made a motion to postpone the pending bill and proceed to the consideration of the bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which will leave them the unfinished business.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; on that or any other motion I wish to make this suggestion: If the Senator from Illinois will just select the time he thinks wise, and ask the Senate to take up his bills, I do not believe he will have any trouble in doing it.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to take them up as soon as the executive business is disposed of.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 12, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

There being no objection, the motion was entertained and agreed to.

DESTITUTE PEOPLE OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3673) making an appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, appropriates $500,000 to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act of April 23, 1874, to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River; and also of the joint resolution authorizing the President to issue Army rations and clothing to the destitute people on the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, approved May 28, 1874, for the purpose of purchasing supplies of food to be issued under his direction to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi, Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, who have been rendered so by reason of the recent overflow; and it directs the Secretary of War to make detailed report to Congress of the expenditure under the act and under the joint resolution referred to. The authority conferred on the Secretary of War is to expire on the 1st day of September, 1874, and none of the moneys appropriated by the bill, or formerly appropriated, are to be expended except in cases where the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that there is an actual and pressing case of destitution, and that such destitution is directly caused by the overflow. Any balance remaining unexpended of the appropriation provided for by the act of April 23, 1874, may be used for the purposes expressed in that act or in the joint resolution; and the Secretary of War is authorized to issue any of the moneys appropriated by the bill or formerly appropriated for the relief of destitute persons upon the Tennessee River when satisfied that their necessities arise from the recent overflow of said river.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL IRON-MOLDERS' UNION.

Mr. FIELD. I desire to report a bill from the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not call the regular order just now, but will allow matters which give rise to no debate to be disposed of.

Mr. FIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Education and Labor the bill (H. R. No. 3521) to incorporate the National Iron-molders' Union, for passage at this time.

The bill was read.

Mr. CROOKE. I object.

Mr. FIELD. I move to suspend the rules so as to put that bill upon its passage. It has been considered by the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CROOKE. It is not reported from the Committee on Education and Labor. The gentleman from Michigan, as a member of that committee, was permitted to introduce it individually.

Mr. FIELD. Not at all; it was by the action of the committee that it was to be reported.

Mr. CROOKE. The bill establishes a new principle. I am a member of that committee and I have said from the beginning that I wished to antagonize this bill. It ought not to pass without consideration.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield for a motion to suspend the rules now.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

CLAIMS OF CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move that the rules be suspended so that it shall be in order to consider the following as a part of the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes:

That in order to fulfill and discharge the obligations assumed by the United States under the eleventh and twelfth articles of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians, concluded June 22, 1855, and in order to provide for the payment and satisfaction of the award of the Senate of the United States, under the provisions of article 11 of the said treaty, made on the 9th day of March, 1859, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed and required to issue and deliver to Peter P. Pitchlynn and Peter Folsom, the authorized delegates and agents of the Choctaw Nation, or to either of them who may demand the same on behalf of the said nation, bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and of the act of Congress approved January 20, 1871, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,'" for an amount equal to the sum stated and found to be due to the Choctaw Nation under the said award, as shown by the account stated by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with and in conformity to the said award, and reported by him to Congress, and printed and contained in House Executive Document No. 82, of the first session of the Thirty-sixth Congress, deducting from said amount the following sums, to wit: the sum of $362,100.70, and the further sum of $286,595.75, together with interest on the sum stated in the said executive document as due to the Choctaw Nation from the United States, under the said award, after deducting the sums above stated, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from the 2d day of March, 1861, until the said bonds shall be issued to the said delegates or agents of the Choctaw Nation as herein directed: Provided, That from the sum due the Choctaw Nation as shown in the said executive document and account stated, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct the sum of $250,000, paid to the said delegates for and on account of the said nation, and on account of the said award, on the 12th day of April, 1861: And pro-

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not that require a vote of the House?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The gentleman has no right to object. I have the floor and move to suspend the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood it was by unanimous consent.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Not at all; the Chair recognized me especially to make the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri was recognized before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] sought the floor.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Certainly; the gentleman from Ohio was not in his seat when I was recognized.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules, upon which tellers were ordered; and Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, and Mr. HALE, of Maine, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 110, noes 36.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Upon this question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. At this stage, is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion is to suspend the rules and make what has been read a part of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There does not appear to have been any explanation to the House.

Mr. MCCRARY. Is the motion to make this a part of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] is to suspend the rules so "that it shall be in order to consider the following"—that is, what has been read—"a part of the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875." It is not to make it in order to move it as an amendment to the bill, but to place it in the bill, and then it must be voted out if the House is opposed to it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Therefore there will be no yeas and nays on the question after this.

The SPEAKER. Not unless it should be brought up in the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. And this settles it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 73, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barnum, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Ward, Wilber, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, and Pierce M. B. Young—60.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the order made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move to go into Committee of the Whole on the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. FIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will do so if it gives rise to no delay.

Mr. FIELD. I move to suspend the rules and pass House bill No. 3521, to incorporate the National Iron-molders' Union.

Mr. POTTER. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it gives rise to delay I cannot yield. I insist upon my motion.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to move to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated by me on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion, as it relates to the bill upon which the House will go into Committee of the Whole.

vided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall neither entertain, recognize, allow, nor pay any of the various claims or pretended claims which have heretofore been demanded, or which shall hereafter be demanded, by any claim agents, attorneys, or pretended owners of the said bonds by purchase or otherwise, or of any part thereof; nor shall the Secretary of the Treasury recognize or sanction any contract or pretended contract, made on behalf of the Choctaw Nation, providing for the payment of any compensation or fees for the collection or prosecution of the claims of the Choctaw Nation against the United States, but the said bonds shall be issued and delivered as herein provided: And provided further, That before the delivery of the said bonds to the said delegates as herein directed, the national council of the Choctaw Nation shall pass an act approving the provisions of this act, and shall declare that the receipt of the said bonds by the said delegates, or either of them, on behalf of the said nation, is accepted and received by the said nation as a full payment and satisfaction of all claims of the said nation, whether national or individual, growing out of the cession of lands by the said nation to the United States, under the treaty of September 27, 1830; a copy of which act, attested by the seal of the said nation, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury previous to the delivery of the said bonds to the delegates aforesaid.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be so suspended that when the House is in Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil expense bill it shall be in order for the Committee of the Whole to consider and pass upon an amendment in relation to the preference in Government employment of soldiers and sailors and their dependent relatives; and also in relation to diminishing and stopping the expenses of carrying examinations by boards of commissioners and others traveling around the country at public charge, and the detailing of clerks of the Departments to act in judgment upon their fellow-clerks, and to exercise thereby the appointing power which is by the Constitution vested in the heads of the several Executive Departments, who ought to be men of sufficient discretion to appoint their own clerks without being tied up by rules and regulations imposed upon them by a board composed in whole or in part of those very clerks themselves.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to that; there are three or four stump speeches in the belly of it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to know what this motion will accomplish, whether, if it be adopted, anything touching these subjects can be offered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Anything germane as an amendment can be offered.

The question being on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. WILLARD of Vermont, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes not counted.

So the motion was seconded.

The question recurring on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules,

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. A portion of this motion refers to making it an order to discuss the question of appointing soldiers to office and giving them the preference.

Mr. RANDALL. We are all in favor of that.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Yes, as the gentleman says, we are all in favor of that. Now, I want to know whether we cannot discuss that question under the rules of the House, and have not heretofore discussed it and acted on it?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The Clerk began to call the roll.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to the roll-call being interrupted.

The SPEAKER. If it be a proper parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will hear it.

Mr. KASSON. I believe it to be such; the Chair will judge. I wish to inquire whether, if this proposition be adopted, it will be in order in Committee of the Whole, under this privilege given by the House, to move a section to this effect——

The SPEAKER. The Chair never rules as Speaker upon questions which the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole will be called upon as such to decide. Therefore, without hearing further the gentleman's inquiry, the Chair declines to rule upon it. The Clerk will proceed with the roll-call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 66, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Bell, Berry, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Brown, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clements, Stephen A. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Packer, Page, Pelham, Perry, Phillips, Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Read, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Scofield, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Stone, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Thornburgh, Todd, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Woodworth, and John D. Young—156.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Atkins, Barnum, Bland, Bromberg, Buckner, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Creamer, Crooke, Crounse, Eden, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gunckel, Harrison, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hunton, Jewett, Kasson, Kellogg, Lawson, Lowe, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Neal, O'Brien, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Randall, Rice, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, John Q. Smith, Sprague, Starkweather, Storm, Swann, Christopher Y. Thomas, Townsend, Vance, Wells, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bright, Burrows, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Cotton, Cox, Crocker, DeWitt, Dobbins, Eldredge, Elliott, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, John T. Harris, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hersey, Holman, Kelley, Killinger, Leach, Lowndes, Maynard, McCrary, McJunkin, McLean, Mitchell, Nunn, Orth, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Purman, Robbins, William R. Roberts, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sheldon, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Wilber, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, and Pierce M. B. Young—67.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the order was made.

HOME FOR THE AGED.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the rules be so suspended as to make it in order to move in Committee of the Whole as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill an appropriation of $25,000 to the Home for the Aged, under the charge of the Little Sisters of the Poor, for the completion of the building now begun as the Home for the Aged in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

SESSION FOR BUSINESS OF NAVAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that a session be ordered for Wednesday evening next, for business of the Committee on Naval Affairs, including bills already reported but not acted on.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that there must be a quorum here.

There being no objection, the order was made.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE ON CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill all debate on the subject of civil-service reform be limited to twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT, SOMERVILLE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. GOOCH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3674) to authorize the use of condemned ordnance in the erection of a soldiers' monument at Somerville, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane;

An act (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of B. W. Harris, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Massachusetts;

An act (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the widening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States marine hospital at Detroit, Michigan;

An act (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress, and of the Declaration of Independence;

An act (H. R. No. 2208) authorizing the President to reinstate George M. Book on the active list of the Navy;

An act (H. R. No. 3073) relating to embassadors, consuls, and other officers; and

An act (H. R. No. 3601) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876.

Mr. DARRELL, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 529) to authorize an appointment in the Inspector-General's Department;

An act (S. No. 533) granting a pension to Uriah W. Briggs;

An act (S. No. 624) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands granted to the State of Oregon in certain cases;

An act (S. No. 658) granting a pension to Martin V. Jackson;

An act (S. No. 693) to change the time for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin at Oshkosh;

An act (S. No. 793) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the schooner Jennie Spear to that of Santa Rosa; and

An act (S. No. 870) giving the assent of Congress to the acceptance by the officers of the United States ship Monocacy of silver medals presented to them by the King of Siam.

REVISION OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3675) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights," approved July 8, 1870; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed and recommitted.

MOIETIES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties; which, with the accompanying report, were ordered to be printed and recommitted.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3007) granting a pension to Cordelia Wilkins;

An act (H. R. No. 3009) for the relief of Michael Bannon, of Dayton, Ohio;

An act (H. R. No. 3011) granting a pension to Mrs. Letitia Carr;

An act (H. R. No. 3012) granting a pension to John Heddinger;

An act (H. R. No. 3014) to place the name of Mrs. Caroline Duncan on the pension-roll;

An act (H. R. No. 3019) granting a pension to George H. Reynolds;

An act (H. R. No. 2419) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge, to date the 7th day of June, 1870;

An act (H. R. No. 2866) relieving the political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee; and

An act (H. R. No. 1297) for the relief of Thomas J. Crittenden, of Missouri.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move before going into committee that all further debate in relation to the civil-service system on the pending appropriation bill be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will amend his motion and make it twenty-five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, then, to make it twenty-five minutes. If there be no objection I will yield to my colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. BECK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the gentleman from Ohio the right to yield?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. BECK. Then I object, and insist we shall go on regularly.

The question recurred on the motion to limit the debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the civil-service system to twenty-five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 250 add the following:

To enable the President of the United States to perfect and put in force such rules regulating the civil service as may from time to time be adopted by him, with authority to allow such compensation for special services under the act of 1871, to persons already in the service of the Government, as he may deem proper, $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on this subject by order of the House in twenty-five minutes.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I endeavored yesterday to obtain the floor, and desire now to occupy the attention of the committee for a few minutes. As I understand, sir, some remarks made by gentlemen yesterday in criticism of the Administration, there seemed to be a disposition to criticise the President, because in his early life he was not as they say brought up in idleness and in that refined society which some gentlemen seem to think necessary for the proper administration of the Government. By one gentleman he is said to have been a mule-driver. By some one he is said to be a man wanting in ability.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will be found when we look over the history of this Administration that the President of the United States will not suffer in comparison, either in his associations or in his education, with any gentlemen that have criticised him and his Administration. If we go back to the war we shall find that the President, as the leader of our Army, was equal to the occasion. And when the recorded acts of his Administration are passed under the calm review of history I believe it will be found that he has been equally great in civil service as in war.

Why, Mr. Chairman, is it the fact that the President is wanting in ability? Surely his enemies cannot pretend to bring this charge against him in earnest. What have such men as the leaders of the rebellion said in regard to that? Take Mr. STEPHENS, the honorable gentleman from Georgia—what was his testimony here and what was his testimony elsewhere? What has been the testimony of other men, like Lee and Longstreet, who have been his opponents? Why, Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen who make their fine rose-water speeches, they and their speeches will pass into oblivion when there will still live the great acts and the recorded utterances of our President that have become immortal. I mean such utterances as "unconditional surrender," "I mean to fight it out on this line though it takes all summer," and that beautiful speech of his in which he invoked the God of Peace. Those brief utterances of the President will live when all these fanciful, bouquet-speeches will have passed out of existence and been forgotten. And the recorded acts of the President will live when all his accusers are dead and buried.

Mr. Chairman, let me say one word as to civil-service reform. I voted for it in the committee. I shall vote for it here. We have not accomplished all we may, but the fact is we are going on unto perfection; and I assert here to-day, and challenge contradiction of the statement, that the civil service of this country to-day is unsurpassed by the civil service of any period of our history. Take the collection of our revenue and compare it with the collection in the times of Andrew Johnson. Take the whisky tax. It ran down from a collection on sixty million gallons to a collection on six millions. Under the administration of President Grant and Mr. BOUTWELL it went back to a collection on sixty million gallons, as is shown by the annexed table.

The above statement is made up from reports of collectors to this office on form 22, and shows the amount of tax actually returned during the several fiscal years. (See pages 154 and 155, Commissioner's Report for 1873.)

By act of July 1, 1862, the tax imposed on distilled spirits was 20 cents per gallon; March 7, 1864, it was raised to 60 cents; July 1, 1864, to $1.50; January 1, 1865, to $2.00. By act of July 20, 1868, it was reduced to 50 cents. By act of June 6, 1872, it was raised to 70 cents.

The records show that the revenues of the country have been steadily maintained, in spite of the abolition of numerous and productive taxes, and the great reduction of others. From some important sources the revenue has largely increased.

Thus, during the three years from 1866 to 1869, under Johnson, the total returns from spirits, tobacco, fermented liquors, banks and bankers, and adhesive stamps, were $224,806,369. In three years, from 1869 to 1872, under Grant, they were $329,861,532, an increase of $102,055,163. We find that spirits yielded in three years under Johnson $93,454,054; in three years under Grant $151,935,618, an increase of 64 per cent. Tobacco during the same periods yielded $58,798,784 in the first, and $97,479,096 in the last, being an increase of 67 per cent.

Descending still more to detail, we find that in Virginia in forty-four months, under Johnson, tobacco yielded only $1,500,000. In thirty-nine months under Grant a lower tax yields $13,000,000, being an increase of 800 per cent. These are examples of the thoroughness with which the revenues are collected.

The economy of collection is equally capable of demonstration. Turning to the customs revenues, we find that whereas these cost 6.25 per cent. to collect in 1860, under Buchanan, they cost in 1870, under Grant, only 3.20 per cent., and in 1871 only 3.11 per cent., being less than half the cost under a democratic administration.

Take all of our taxes and you will find that they are collected at a smaller ratio of expense than they were in the administration of Mr. Buchanan. Who are these gentlemen who are accusing the administration of President Grant? They are men of diseased imaginations and hungry stomachs; men who want to get back into power; they are the men that uphold Mr. Buchanan's administration, when in a time of peace with all the world he run the nation into debt more than $90,000,000, and we have had to pay during this very year the interest on that, besides all the burdens that the war has imposed upon us.

Here and there, Mr. Chairman, they may pick out some clerk who has not come up to the high standard of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] He speaks of one who passed an excellent examination, who could not get a berth. Everybody cannot have a place. But I say here, and I have the proof in my hands, that the revenue has never before been collected as faithfully and economically as it is to-day under the administration of President Grant. This is the best test of civil-service reforms.

*Of the 61,087,997 gallons returned at 50 cents 24,383,951.3 gallons were in bond July 20, 1868. An additional tax of 10 cents per gallon was imposed on this amount. One cent more additional was imposed on 5,169,527 gallons not withdrawn prior to April 20, 1869. Two million four hundred and ninety thousand and ninety dollars and forty cents, the tax on these two quantities, added to $30,735,121.71 give $33,225,212.11, the amount opposite No. 2, page 155, in Commissioner's Report for 1873.

It is easy for gentlemen to get up here and declaim about mule-drivers, and say that the President was not brought up in good society or that he does not possess the qualities of high statesmanship; but I tell you that the people of this country discussed those questions in 1872, when the administration was arraigned and the people decided in favor of the President and in favor of an honest administration and against his defamers, and they will do it again.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Just one moment more. Notwithstanding all these accusations the people indorsed the administration and they will do it again, whenever they get a square issue at the polls.

Mr. COX. Was that the issue in Connecticut?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The issue in Connecticut was in reference to whisky, and when the democrats knew that they began to kick around in their coffins.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I thought it was necessary to answer the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I have listened with pleasure to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER.] He seemed to be very much in earnest, and I always like to see a gentleman appear to be in earnest, whether he be so or not.

It happened that in the Forty-first Congress when this civil-service reform amendment to the appropriation bill which was read yesterday was adopted, I was a member of a committee for the examination of the civil service, a committee similar to that of which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has now the honor of being chairman. The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Jenckes) was chairman of that committee, he being, as I consider him, the author and prime mover in this civil-service reform movement, and the gentleman who first gave it life and form in this country.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] therefore, was mistaken yesterday when he attributes the paternity of this matter to the then Senator from Illinois, (Mr. Trumbull.) Mr. Trumbull, I believe, did in the Senate offer the clause which was adopted as the basis of our present system of civil reform; but the whole subject was introduced and debated here for two or three years before that by the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. Jenckes,) before it took the shape that it did when it became a law, on March 30, 1871.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Senator Trumbull was its chief advocate in the Senate.

Mr. NIBLACK. But the movement commenced with Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, and its ultimate success was really due to him in this House. I have been in favor of some kind of reform in the civil service for many years past, but I opposed the appropriation which at that time was made for the purpose; and I have opposed the present scheme from the very beginning, because I thought that some reform in the political condition of the country must precede any healthy and successful reformation in the Executive Departments of the Government, or in any matters that concerned the patronage which each party takes possession of every time it elects a President or any other officer having patronage. I did not believe the party in power then prepared to surrender any of its substantial patronage, and, hence, regarded any pretense that it was with incredulity, as a most shallow pretext. I am induced to believe from the indications I have seen within the last year or two that the people are alive to this view of the case, and from the declarations I have seen from the people assembled in conventions and otherwise, at different places on many recent occasions, it would seem that they are fully impressed with the necessity of some reformation of this sort on their own part, commencing with the election of a President and members of Congress and all the other officers who have anything to do with the civil service of the Government to which the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut refers.

For myself, I regard the present effort, as I presumed it would be in the beginning, as a complete and total failure, simply because instead of giving clerks and other subordinate officers some kind of tenure of office, which it was first claimed was the real purpose of this civil-service reform, the civil-service commissioners have contented themselves with merely assisting the President in driving off applicants for office and thereby making it a little easier for those inside to retain their places sometimes, but at the same time making them no more independent of the appointing power or of political influence than they were before. My idea of civil-service reform is and has been to give subordinate officers, clerks, and others of that class to which it is intended to apply a certain tenure of office of some kind, during which they shall not be removed except for cause other than merely political differences. We should thus take out from the elections this idea that when a party succeeds it is to displace every person opposed to it, no matter what position he may occupy or how valuable his services may be. That I thought was the object, and that I thought was the great point in favor of civil-service reform when it was first suggested here. But those professedly engaged in this reformation commenced on another theory altogether, and the result has been in all its essentials an utter and notable failure to accomplish what was very generally anticipated. I think there ought to be some guarantee of qualifications, some examination before the clerks or other employés enter the public service. That is conceded. But after he has received his appointment let him stand upon his record, and be promoted according to his status in the Department or in the office which he holds. Instead of that, we have had what is called a competitive examination for promotion as well as for original appointment. This is simply putting theory against practice, and ignores the record of the applicant for promotion, no matter how honorable or meritorious it may be. That, in my judgment, is unbusiness-like and totally indefensible. I would like to say something about the kind of examination applicants are often subjected to, but my time will not permit.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] who has just addressed the House, and with other gentlemen who have spoken in the same vein, in their declaration that the experiment that has been attempted at reform in the civil service has thus far been a failure. Further than that, I am bound to say that I believe myself that the evils in the civil service that exist are the necessary results of the existing condition of the Government, and that without a change in the Constitution itself they cannot be permanently and effectually remedied. Nevertheless I shall vote for the appropriation asked by the gentleman from Connecticut, because so long as there are such great and such generally admitted evils in the civil service as now exist, it seems to me to be the duty of every man to give to those who claim that they are willing to make an honest and bona fide attempt at reform some means and opportunity of essaying it.

And now, having said this, I desire to add further why it is I think that under the existing condition of the Government the evils attending the present civil service are unavoidable.

At the time of the formation of this Government the appointing power of the President of the United States was so small that the fathers who framed the Constitution gave no attention whatever to the subject of the tenure of office by subordinate officers; and when the First Congress assembled it was a matter of grave debate whether men appointed to such offices held their offices during good behavior, or whether it was in the power of the President to remove them. It was finally decided that the President had the power to remove. With the growth of the country things have gone on from that day to this, until now the President of the United States has the power of appointment to upward of eighty thousand offices, whose incumbents hold their places at his absolute will and pleasure.

Before the introduction of the telegraph it was a necessity that the appointing power should to some extent be relegated to localities. When a man wrote to complain of the conduct of a subordinate officer in a remote section of the country the Department had to write back and make inquiries, and the party complained of had to have an opportunity to respond, and these communications had to be carried on by the mails, and there were therefore necessarily long delays resulting. Hence the President had no means of exercising prompt and efficient discipline over his appointees, and so the patronage had to be distributed to the members of Congress and Senators or others leading friends of the Administration in each State. But now, by the aid of the telegraph, the President is able to discipline the most distant officer as readily as he can a clerk in Washington. If a postmaster in Oregon or Florida fails to keep up his end of the party whiffletree, he can be reached and dealt with by the President as promptly as if he were only serving in an adjoining public Department.

Now I take it that it is an underestimate to say that these eighty thousand office-holders control each five votes. Each one has either a father, or father-in-law, or brother, or some other intimate friend who will vote with him to keep him in place—say not less than four voters apiece, making with his own vote five. Is not that a low estimate? Thus these eighty thousand office-holders, with the voters they may be said to control, in all four hundred thousand votes, are within the absolute control and power of the President, and that is at least 10 per cent. of the vote polled by any political party in a presidential election. So that this power of appointment to office has come to be a means by which a man can almost control nominations and elections, and which is every year getting greater and therefore more dangerous.

Now, nobody who reflects about this can, I think, really believe that any great political party is going to voluntarily lay down a power of this sort and under the guise of examinations in respect of reading, writing, and arithmetic, strip themselves of so great a control. The result of the proposed civil-service examinations may be to bring into the public service men who are more expert in arithmetic and orthography; but it will not result in getting men appointed who belong to any other political party than that of the examiners and appointers; nor in setting the officials free from that absolute dependence on the party in power from which the dangers and evils of our civil service result. Therefore I believe that some other change more radical than anything yet proposed is necessary to effect a permanent reform of the civil service. I believe that a change in the Constitution itself is required to meet an evil which the fathers did not provide for because they did not foresee it. They were providing a government for three millions of poor and scattered people in thirteen States widely separate. We are legislating for forty millions of people, rich, prosperous, and knit together by all the modern appliances of intercommunication, and have evils to deal with which they could not have anticipated. No statesmen such as they were, making a constitution for the government of these States to-day, would leave to the Executive of the Government any such extraordinary, unrepublican, and dangerous powers as he has thus gradually come to possess. On the contrary, they would in some way limit and localize somewhere the power for these appointments. Why, sir, should it not be that all the postmasters of the country, and all the local officers of the Federal Government, such as assessors and tax-collectors should be appointed in the localities where they serve, either chosen directly by the people or the municipalities or the States, or in some other way selected by the localities where they perform their duties? In that way, and that only, can we decentralize and break up the powers of appointment by the President already so vast and dangerous.

On the other hand, why should not the subordinates in the Departments and Bureaus and Government offices hold their places during good behavior, and be subject to removal only when they misbehave themselves? Some such measure as that would be a real measure of reform; some such movement as that is in the interest of good and sound government, and I shall be glad to see the day when the people are ready for it. But we cannot secure such a reform at once; we cannot readily change the long-established practice of the Government in this country. In this age nothing is more difficult than to get the people to consider the fundamental principles of government. Favored by circumstances and the natural conditions of the country, they have come to ascribe, often erroneously, the national prosperity to the existing forms of government which the fathers established, and are reluctant to make any change in these forms even when the reasons which once led to them have wholly ceased to exist. A time of such prosperity as this generation has enjoyed is never favorable to such reflections. Either men are oppressed with the cares of an excessive business which leave little opportunity for reflection upon the principles of government, or else they live, after they retire from business, in a round of pleasure and excitement hardly more favorable for such reflections. Thus it happens that in order to secure the attention of the people to the necessity of any reform which can be effected only by a change in the Constitution, the matter will have to be pressed upon their attention long and earnestly.

Now I hope, sir, that this commission upon civil-service reform, if it effects nothing else, will at least serve to continue to direct the attention of the country to the evils of the civil service, and that when the people realize that these evils cannot be corrected by merely scratching along the surface and that something more is required, they will thus come to a condition in which they will be ready to recognize the real cause of such evils, and will prepare for some such change in our system of government itself as is absolutely necessary, as I believe, before any reform of these great evils can be made that will be lasting and useful. Therefore it is that I give this appropriation my support.

Mr. KELLOGG. After the vote which has been taken this morning, I will say to my friends candidly, that if they will listen to me for the five minutes to which I am entitled upon this subject, I presume they will not hear from me again upon it during this session. As chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, I have endeavored to the best of my ability to discharge my duties upon all the subjects referred to us. I will say this frankly, that I believe if the Speaker had gone through the whole list of his committees he could not have found another one of which I would have been so unwilling to take the chairmanship, as the one to which I was appointed; but I have always thus far in this House tried to do the work assigned me. I say this in view of the temper of this House upon this subject, which I believe I understood at the beginning of this session substantially as I understand it now. Not that I am personally opposed to civil service reform, but I know the temper of the House upon the subject, and it is not a pleasant thing to contend against the odds I have upon this question. And if the vote of this House this morning shall be carried out in Committee of the Whole upon this subject, I do not intend to spend a great deal more time upon it. If I know anything which I can in a practical way under the order of the House do to better the condition of affairs in any of the Departments of the Government, or in any other way, I will with pleasure do it; but I shall trouble the House with no more speeches upon this reform.

Now a word or two in regard to the speeches just made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] I thank them for their candor in this matter. I did not think that last night the House was in just the proper temper to consider a question of this importance. All there is in it is simply an appropriation of $15,000, which your President asks for, in addition to the $10,000 of the unexpended appropriation made last year, for the purpose of devising means to make your civil service higher, better, nobler, and purer if it can be done. I say in all sincerity and honesty that the effort to make a better civil service is worth continuing. It is the wrong way for us to improve the civil service, to seek to strike down this system before it has had a fair trial on its merits, and to strike down the aspirations of the people for a better civil service by refusing this paltry appropriation when you have an existing law for it. It is not the manly thing to do to pass a law requiring the President to do certain things to improve the civil service, and then refuse to give him the necessary appropriation to carry that law into effect.

I know that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] has been the champion of his side of the matter, and claims to lead the House upon this question. A great deal less able man, a much smaller man than he, could lead this House in its present state of feeling in that direction, and it would need a much greater and abler leader than he is to hope to lead this House the other way upon this subject. We have heard time and time again his story of that poor old soldier. The real trouble about that poor soldier is that the record shows that there were two or three other soldiers who passed a better examination than his poor soldier did at the same time. And how could he get his soldier in when there were other soldiers who showed themselves better fitted for the place?

There is not one of us who wish to have soldiers who are qualified kept out of office by this system, although I admit that we who voted against the hybrid, miserable, patch-work specimen of a resolution which was offered here this morning by the gentleman had to vote against the soldier clause as he put it—there is not one of us who does not wish the soldiers to have preference, if they are equally capable of performing the duties of the offices to which they aspire. But we do not want to fill up our Departments with soldiers who cannot properly discharge their duties, because they are soldiers. It is not good civil service or good economy to do that, nor is it what the soldiers themselves ask for. They do not ask so senseless a thing.

My friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who made a speech here last night—I am sorry that he is not in his seat now—I thought was going for civil service by what he had before said. But he struck hands with the gentleman from Massachusetts and turned his battery upon it. Yet the only point he made from the beginning to the end of his remarks against our civil service was in regard to the enormous expense of collecting the internal revenue, and he has given half a dozen mortal long columns of figures. I turn him over to his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who is the principal champion of the cheap and economical way in which we collect our internal revenue. My friend from New York [Mr. COX] does not want any tariff, or internal-revenue taxes either; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] wants a tariff only upon hemp, and internal revenue for all the rest. They want between them to blot out the internal revenue and the tariff both. Now I say that during this Administration the expense has been diminished both in the rate of the expense of collection of internal revenue and of tariff duties, and the service has been greatly improved in both these great sources of revenue. If my friend from New York, in the wisdom of his statesmanship, can discover some way in which we can go on as a government without either internal-revenue taxes or tariff duties, then I confess we can save the expense of the officials employed to collect them, and shall not need any further civil-service reform in that direction.

Men get up here on the other side of the House and talk about the civil service as being worse now than it was in the time of Andrew Johnson and in the days preceding this Administration. Sir, there were at that time forty men on the rolls of the Department not doing duty where there is one now. I admit there are a few now, but there were forty then to one at this time. Most of these drones have been driven out, as all such ought to be; and I will not stand here and hear this charge that our civil service has been growing worse under this system, coming either from friend or foe of this Administration, without denying and refuting it upon the spot; and the records of the Departments will prove the truth of what I now say.

And now one word more. My friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] is mistaken in one respect. He thinks the tenure of office is no more secure under this system than before. This very civil-service reform does make a tenure of office. In the rules that have been adopted neither clerks nor postmasters, as well as some other officers, are to be turned out except for cause, and that is one chief respect in which the service has been improved. A clerk who discharges his duties faithfully and well, an efficient and honest postmaster, is not removed as formerly at the simple request of a Representative, before his term of office has expired; but some cause or reason must be shown why a change should be made before such an officer is now ordinarily removed before the expiration of his term.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is whether the order of this debate has been prearranged, or is it a free fight? If it has been prearranged, then I will step out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. GARFIELD. The simple question before the House now is not whether the civil-service examination that has been devised is a wise and just thing and the best thing that can be done. It is whether we will try any longer to do anything to better our civil service. I hope gentlemen will make that issue squarely and fairly and meet it. If we say now that no further effort shall be made, that the whole matter shall be abandoned, then say so; that is plain and square work. If we propose to return to the old democratic system that we have inherited and been using, the system that holds that the whole body of patronage, that the forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand office-holders of the country are a mere set of pawns to be played for in politics, to be given as gifts to political victors, if we simply mean to trade and make merchandise of the offices of the United States, say it; say it and parcel out to the victorious members of Congress and the victorious party-leaders their share of the gifts of office; say it and stand by it, with your heads up in the light, and defend it. But if, on the contrary, we believe that the offices of the Government were made for the service of the nation and not to be the peculium of individuals, then let us at least be willing to keep on experimenting and see whether there be any way by which this great national shame can be in part at least abated. The plain proposition now is that we like swine shall return to our wallowing in the mire; that all the past which we have resolved against in conventions and written against in our political pamphlets shall now be hugged and embraced as the true political doctrine of the American future.

Now, I do not believe in most of the things that have been done in this matter of civil-service examinations. Much of it is trifling. It is too schoolmasterly. There is a great deal in it that does not come up to the level of our practical necessities. But let us try, try on; and let us appropriate the small sum of $25,000 to keep trying, so as to see whether something may not be done to better the civil-service of the United States. With this view I implore gentlemen on this floor not to throw us back into the abuses of the past, and abandon all hope or purpose of doing anything better for the future. On this score I hope—no, I wish—that this House would appropriate the sum proposed; and I regret that the Committee on Appropriations did not embody such a proposition in the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now offer an amendment which was read yesterday. I intend to vote for the pending amendment, and I hope it will be adopted; but I should be glad to have attached to it the amendment which I now offer, to add the following:

And it shall be the duty of the civil-service commissioners to report to the President, to be transmitted to Congress at its next session, a bill or plan for reorganizing all the Departments of the Government so as to equalize salaries, and, so far as practicable, to reduce the expenses and increase the efficiency thereof.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make the point of order that that amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] point out any law under which this amendment is in order?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The law authorizes the President to appoint civil-service commissioners, and it seems to me proper to prescribe their duties. If this amendment can be adopted it will effect a real reform—a civil-service reform. The civil-service commissioners are able men, and I have confidence in their capacity to render great public service. I have the honor to represent one of them, who resides in my district, Mr. Shellabarger, and I know his ability to render valuable service. The civil-service reform is in its infancy, and we should foster and encourage it. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that we should provide that Union soldiers should have a preference in appointments to office, and I am ready to vote accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They are appointed by the President; and we cannot impose duties on them except by new legislation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly, when we are legislating upon this subject, it is competent for us to prescribe additional duties—duties which are in the line of the service they are rendering. They have rendered valuable and efficient service; and I think we ought to sustain them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President of the United States to perfect and put in force such rules regulating the civil service as may from time to time be adopted by him, with authority to allow such compensation for special services under the act of 1871, to persons already in the service of the Government as he may deem proper, $25,000.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 50, noes 98.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the gentleman will agree to let us have a vote on this question in the House we can dispense with tellers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not wish to take time; I withdraw the call for tellers.

Mr. WOODFORD. I renew the call for tellers. The call will be withdrawn if the gentleman from Ohio will allow us the yeas and nays on the proposition in the House, so that the country may know precisely where we stand.

Several members objected to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] indicate any method by which it may be assured that this amendment shall be offered and the yeas and nays had upon it in the House? Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will not call for tellers if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will agree——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further count is insisted on——

Mr. LOWE. A further count is insisted on.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and Mr. KELLOGG were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 108.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MCCRARY. I wish to renew an amendment which I offered yesterday, to which I think there will now be no objection. It is to insert after line 280 the following:

That the proper accounting officer shall allow and pay to Eunice Barcus whatever sum may be found to have been due to her step-son, Henry Barcus, as bounty or arrears of pay as a private of Company K, Eighth Regiment Iowa Veteran Volunteer Infantry, in the war of the rebellion, at the time of his death, and in accordance with his last will and testament, and the sum required for this purpose is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Was not this amendment ruled out yesterday on a point of order?

Mr. MCCRARY. It was; but I presume the point may not be pressed to-day.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not object to this particular claim. I presume it is just. The only question is as to the propriety of making an appropriation in this way. Still as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] appeals to me, I will not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum:

For the support of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, over and above the probable amount which will be received from pay patients, $24,000.

Mr. COBURN. I move to strike out the last word. I saw a report of this Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum printed in 1873, a large report with plates, the work being done at the Government Printing Office, and I inquired of the Government Printer what the cost was. I have his report, but in round numbers it was some $8,600. I looked through the appropriations for 1872 and 1873, and I found no appropriation for printing anything of that kind. I desire now to find out from the committee (if the chairman will give me his attention) whether or not this money goes for the printing of these expensive reports. The report I refer to is a large one of several hundred pages, and, so far as any authority is concerned, I did not know there was any such law for the printing of such expensive reports. It was a much more expensive report than the Agricultural Report or any document almost issued under the order of Congress. We are now about to appropriate money for the support of this hospital, and I would like to know whether Dr. J. Harry Thompson, who made the report, takes the money appropriated for the support of this institution and diverts it to the getting up of these large, expensive reports?

Mr. GARFIELD. This appropriation is not for printing at all. It goes wholly to the support of this institution. The report the gentleman from Indiana alludes to was printed by order of Congress, and was entirely aside from the support of this institution.

Mr. COBURN. When was it ordered to be printed?

Mr. GARFIELD. A year or a year and a half ago. It went to the Secretary of the Interior and was referred by him to Congress, and was ordered to be printed in the ordinary way.

Mr. COBURN. Then none of this money is to be diverted to any such purpose as the printing of these reports?

Mr. GARFIELD. This cannot be diverted to the printing of such reports, but will go entirely to the support of this institution.

Mr. COBURN. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home, Washington City, District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $12,000: Provided, That hereafter no child or children shall be admitted into said home except "the destitute orphans of soldiers and sailors who have died in the late war on behalf of the Union of these States," as provided for in section 3 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home," approved July 25, 1866: And provided further, That no child shall remain in said home after having attained the age of sixteen years.

Mr. COOK. I move to amend that section by striking out the first proviso, from line 531 to 537. It is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no child or children shall be admitted into said home except "the destitute orphans of soldiers and sailors who have died in the late war on behalf of the Union of these States," as provided for in section 3 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home," approved July 25, 1866.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to this appropriation. It is all proper enough for this Government to take care of these orphans in this District; but this provision contains within it what may properly be termed a bill of attainder. It can be nothing else. I have been relieved of my disabilities as have thousand of others, yet here is a provision in this bill appropriating money out of the common Treasury of the country for the support of an institution, excluding a certain class of children from it because of the crimes or penalties of their fathers. That is in effect a bill of attainder, and the Constitution of this country, if it be regarded at all, at its very inception, in the very outset, contains as one of the most cherished principles of this Government, that Congress should never pass any bill of attainder. From the day when our rebel ancestors cut loose from the allegiance to the Crown of Great Britain to this, no such thing has ever been attempted. But here, against the orphans of those who fought against that flag, who may have been right or wrong—wrong certainly on the issues of the war—here is a substantial bill of attainder against them. The Government taxes all those in the South who are able to pay taxes and puts it into the common Treasury of the country, and it is now proposed to distribute that money in support of orphans of one section of the country to the exclusion of those of another section.

I say, gentlemen, it is not right. It is not in accordance with the spirit of harmony you profess. It is not in accordance with the principles on which you subjugated the South; for that subjugation we were told was to be for the benefit of the whole country and not alone for the benefit of the North. If that be true, show it. Show it to-day. Show it in the support of the proposition I have made to strike out this proviso. There may be those in our streets—I know not whether one or a hundred, I have no knowledge on the subject—but there may be those of the excluded class in this District, and I appeal to the candid, calm reflection of every man in this House that the little ragged orphan of the confederate soldier, whose father perished in opposition to the flag of this country, running about your streets, should not be excluded, when his section is taxed to pay the expenses of this Government, part of which taxes are now to be devoted for the support of this institution.

The time may come, sir, when his services may be required in defense of that flag; and there will be found in these children the same brave spirit which prompted their fathers when they fought against that flag. The time may come when some of us now living may be called upon to fight in defense of that flag, and I apprehend that those men whose courage put them in the front—I do not speak of those whose patriotism kept them out of danger—will not be ashamed to stand side by side with this class who are sought to be excluded by this proviso. As a matter of mercy and humanity, if not as a matter of common justice, I ask that this first proviso shall be struck out.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am surprised that my friend from Georgia should construe this into a bill of attainder. A society in the city of Washington incorporated itself under the law, the object of the society being to take care of the orphans of soldiers and sailors who fell in defense of the Union. Of course they had a perfect right to form such an organization, just as gentlemen in my friend's State would have the right to establish a home in which to take care of the orphans of soldiers and sailors who fell fighting against the Union. The orphans admitted to this home are not the children merely of the citizens of Washington, but come from all parts of the country. We simply provide here that no others shall be taken in than those provided for in the charter of the institution. We do not want to erect and maintain a permanent hospital growing out of the war; and the language which the gentleman asks us to strike out is the law as it now stands. It is already on the statute-book. We simply put it here as a notification in regard to what the object of the institution is as stated in its charter. This same charter excludes the children of those who were not soldiers. Will the gentleman say that it is a bill of attainder against civilians on that account? It excludes the children of civilians who were not in the Army. It excludes the children of all except those the charter describes. And I suppose no one would find fault with the gentleman from Georgia if he would establish such an institution in his own State for the children of confederate soldiers.

Mr. COOK. I have no objection to this appropriation. My objection is to its being made exclusively for the benefit of one class and one section. We could no doubt establish an institution in Georgia and say that only the children of confederate soldiers should be admitted. The State of Georgia would alone pay the expense. But the case is different when this institution comes to Congress and asks the common treasure to be taken for its support. We are taxed in Georgia for the education of the children of all classes, colored and white alike. The children of the colored men are receiving the same education and are taught by teachers for the same compensation as the whites. But here we are asked to appropriate public money that belongs to the General Government; and no matter how this organization grew up, although it may be all right as long as these people sustain it from their own charity, I object to the public money being given when the benefits of the institution are confined to a particular class and section of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman think that we should make our pension and bounty laws apply equally to the children of the men who fought on both sides?

Mr. COOK. If you apply these distinctions to those who fought, I say you should not apply them to their orphans; they should not be visited with the sins of their fathers.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

The motion to strike out was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

To aid in the support of the Children's Hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, $5,000.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I offer the following amendment:

After line 541 insert these words: "For the Little Sisters of the Poor, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, $25,000, to be expended solely for paying for and completing their building as a home for the aged."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there any law for that?

The CHAIRMAN. The rules were suspended to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer this amendment.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to state to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that while I have some doubts myself in regard to this appropriation, the ground on which I offer the amendment is that the next item in the bill is an appropriation of $25,000 for the Women's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, "for the sole purpose of erecting a building" for their home for the aged. I understand that the Women's Christian Association is an association formed and under the management of what are called the evangelical sects, the Presbyterians, and I do not know but to some extent some other denominations, not including the Catholics, the Unitarians, the Universalists, and various other denominations.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I am not opposing the gentleman's amendment, but I wish to say with reference to the Women's Christian Association that there is nothing whatever sectarian in its character. They receive children of indigent persons, and make no inquiries in regard to their religious opinions.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think I understand what the gentleman is about to say. I cannot give him my time. I understand that neither of these institutions is sectarian in the sense that the subjects of their charity are to be selected except on the ground of necessities—their need of help.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. That is the fact.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. But I say that the organization which manages the Women's Christian Association is, as I understand, composed exclusively of the persons who belong to the bodies which call themselves evangelical denominations. It seems to me that if the public money is to be appropriated to any institutions that are under sectarian management it should be impartially appropriated, and that a Catholic institution which also receives aged persons, only asking that they should be poor, and without any reference to sect, color, or sex in the administration of the charity, should stand on an equal footing.

I do not know but that in the administration of the charities of this District it is necessary to do it through some religious organizations. I do not object to that if it is thought necessary, although it is always a doubtful question in regard to conferring public money on a sectarian institution, sectarian in its organization and management although not in its objects. I do not therefore intend to oppose the grant to the Women's Christian Association, but it seems to me that if that grant is made, the amendment which I have offered ought to pass, because I believe the institution to which it refers to be purely charitable, to be unsectarian in selecting its objects, and that the fact that it is managed by Catholics should make no distinction in the disposition of the House if it be for charitable purposes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw his amendment for the present and let it await the action of the committee on the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think I know a little too much to do that. I do not propose to allow that provision to be passed and then to have my amendment voted down.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The reason why I ask it is that I suppose the next paragraph in the bill is open to a point of order, and I desire to make the point of order upon it. I think it will be ruled out on the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reply to so much of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] as relates to sectarianism. I have here the charter of the Women's Christian Association, named in the next paragraph of the bill, and I will read an extract from it:

The objects of this association are to afford relief and aid to the destitute, work for those seeking employment, homes for the homeless, sympathy for the friendless; to reform and restore the fallen, and bestow such Christian benevolence upon the needy as our means will allow.

Undenominational in our faith and practice, we would follow the sublime example of our Divine Master, whose charities embraced all alike.

The names of the incorporators are given here, and they are some of them members of the different evangelical churches and some of them members of no churches at all. The society is undenominational so far as its objects are concerned, which I believe is not true of the institution for whose benefit the gentleman from Massachusetts offers his amendment.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am assured that it is true, and that the objects of this charity are received without regard to sectarian views.

Mr. WHEELER. We were differently informed in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NIBLACK. My observation coincides with that of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I have had some occasion to inquire about and look into this institution.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend the amendment so as to increase the appropriation to $26,000.

I desire merely to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.] I am perfectly familiar with this benevolent association in other cities and which has only recently been established in Washington. It is one of the cardinal principles of the order or organization that under no circumstances are they allowed to make any inquiry whatever into the faith or morals of the applicants for relief or those whom they may pick up in the highways and byways and afford assistance to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman what is the age at which the objects of this charity are assisted?

Mr. O'BRIEN. This association was founded about thirty years ago in France, and has since then spread all over the Christian world. It has houses now established in nearly all the principal cities of the United States. I know that it has houses established in New York, in Boston, in Brooklyn, in Chicago, in Saint Louis, and in New Orleans.

Another principle of the order is that they are not allowed to accept any one into their homes unless the applicants or persons who may be brought in are over sixty years of age, with the single exception that in the case of those who are totally paralyzed, they may be received when they are not under fifty-five years of age.

Another cardinal principle of this order or organization is, and it is well that the House should be informed of it, that they are not allowed under any circumstances to receive from any source whatever any funds by which they may be enabled to support the poor under their charge. They may receive donations, whether private or public, for the purpose of building their homes, constructing buildings in which their poor are kept and provided for; but they are compelled to go out into the streets and to solicit personally in behalf of their poor from day to day all that may be necessary to feed and clothe them, and until their poor are fully provided for, until they have exhausted the funds at their command for the purpose of feeding them, none of these religious women are privileged to take their seats at the table and partake of whatever food may be left.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to say to the House that I believe the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] should be adopted as a part of this bill. There seems to be an idea in the minds of some of the gentlemen present that the institution which is spoken of in the gentleman's amendment is sectarian in its character, while the fact is that in the applications to charitable purposes there is nothing sectarian in it, nor is there anything sectarian in the association that is provided for in the next paragraph.

It should be remembered by gentlemen that these two institutions in this city are about the only institutions which send their members out into the highways and byways to gather up the lowest class of poor people and administer charity to them. A majority of those assisted by both of these institutions are not residents of the District proper. The women and children assisted by the Women's Christian Association are from sixteen States of this Union. They have drifted down here, and have been found in the streets, alleys, and lanes of this city, some of them actually in a starving condition, and have been picked up by these charitable women, who to my personal knowledge spend half of their time without compensation in caring for these indigent people.

Now, in reference to the institution for which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] asks an appropriation of $25,000, I desire to say that it reaches a class of poor people not reached by any other charitable institution here. We have been giving money for years, we give it by this bill, to institutions chartered under acts of Congress, though they are not as worthy as these, because the class of people which they reach are a little better able to take care of themselves than the classes cared for by these institutions.

One gentleman here says that he will raise a point of order on the following paragraph in this bill. I hope that will not be done. If there ever was a duty of a charitable nature devolving upon this Congress this is one. At this very session—ay, sir, this very day—you appropriated $500,000 for the suffering poor of the Southern States. No gentleman who will go to these institutions and see the little orphan children and the poor women who have been taken from a suffering and destitute condition and cared for by these charitable people, could ever have the heart to raise the point of order against this proposition.

The people cared for by these institutions are not alone people resident in this District. Some of them come perhaps from the State of the gentleman from Vermont, some perhaps from my own State. I know from an actual census of the inmates of these institutions, that they are from sixteen different States of the Union. They have straggled down here upon one pretext and another, and have been left here without bread, clothing, or shelter. I ask Congress to do this act of charity for the people in these institutions, not for the benefit of the poor in this District simply, but of the poor from all the States of this Union, that they may be cared for by these people who labor from Christian and charitable motives alone.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Here is a very short code of logic by which certain appropriations like these can be supported. It is that whatever is a good thing in itself to do Congress has the power to do, and the Treasury of the United States should be at the expense of doing. No one will question but what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] is entirely right in saying that these associations are beneficent institutions and perform a good work. But there are hundreds and thousands of such institutions scattered all over the United States which never ask and never receive one dollar of support from any State or national appropriation of money. They are supported by the charity and generosity of the people, as all such associations should be supported.

Mr. MERRIAM. The State of New York every year appropriates money for charitable institutions.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not say but what some States appropriate money for such purposes, but I say that there are hundreds and thousands of these institutions not supported by the charity of any public treasury, but maintained by private contributions and charities. In the sundry civil bill of last year there was an appropriation for the Columbian College of $28,500; for the support of the children's hospital, Washington, District of Columbia, $5,000; for the care, support, and medical treatment of seventy-five transient paupers, medical and surgical patients in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, $15,000, and for the Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home of Washington, $15,000. And it is now proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to put in this bill an appropriation of $25,000 for the Little Sisters' Association, and in the next paragraph of this bill is an appropriation for the Women's Christian Association of $25,000.

Now gentlemen of the committee should remember that there is already pending in Committee of the Whole a proposition reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to commence another charitable institution in the District of Columbia. It seems to me that it is worth considering just here, and I call the attention of the committee to it, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, as I understand, have this year refused to recommend any appropriations for the commencement of new public buildings, however much there might seem to be a necessity for commencing them; they have simply recommended appropriations for continuing work on buildings already commenced. Here we have pending in Committee of the Whole, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, one proposition like that I have indicated, and there are two propositions now pending in this bill to commence the erection of new buildings for charitable institutions in the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Allow me to correct the gentleman. This appropriation is not asked to commence a building, but merely to extend one already completed, and upon which this association has expended $25,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. Here are two thoughts which have been interposed in this debate which I should wish might be kept out. It is intimated here that inasmuch as it is proposed to make an appropriation for one institution which is under Protestant management, therefore an appropriation should be made for another institution, which is under Catholic management. Sir, we propose by this charity to give relief to the deserving of whatever creed or faith. If an institution is deserving, it does not matter what religious denomination may have control of it. If it is undeserving, it makes no difference whether it is managed by Catholics or Protestants.

The other idea presented here—and it does not come here for the first time—is that in Middlebury, for example, or Montpelier, or Boston, or Nashville, or Knoxville, or at other places in the country, public institutions are founded by the charity of the citizens there: and therefore the public charitable institutions of Washington should be left to be founded and supported in the same way. That argument forgets, as all such arguments forget, that Washington does not occupy the same relation to its citizens that any other city of the country occupies to its citizens. The citizens of the whole country are brought here, they drift here, they come here, and it is no more fair and just and right that the residents of the place should be charged with their support or held responsible if they fail to make provision for their support, than it is that the people of my State or the State of Vermont should be held responsible in the same way.

These institutions are national in their character and purpose. They support national objects of charity. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] has stated in reference to the one of which he spoke, so I may say of them all: they receive the poor of the country who come here in one way or another. The unfortunate and miserable are found here. They must and will be left to suffer (because private charity is not adequate to their relief) unless we, the legislative power for this District, shall exercise some care to see that proper institutions are established for their maintenance and support.

The institution that is now under consideration was brought to my attention yesterday by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.] It may be a humiliating confession of ignorance when I say that it was the first time that it happened to be brought to my attention. But from the slight examination I have been able to make, it seems to come within the category of these eleemosynary institutions that it has been our practice to foster; and I see no reason why we should make this institution an exception.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, as a proof of what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has just said, that these institutions in Washington are for the benefit of the whole country—the orphans and others that come here from many different States, and that all fare alike, I ask the Clerk to read a list of the previous residences of the beneficiaries in the National Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home in this city.

Washington, District of Columbia, Washington; District of Columbia; New York State; New York State; New York State; Maryland; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Pennsylvania; Pennsylvania; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Jacksonborough, Tennessee; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; New York State; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Cumberland, Maryland; New York State; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia: Johnstown, New York; Johnstown, New York; Johnstown, New York; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Keokuk, Iowa; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Washington, District of Columbia; Pennsylvania; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Washington, District of Columbia; Knoxville, Tennessee; Knoxville, Tennessee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma. I wish to say what I had not time to say when previously on the floor. I make no question whatever that some proportion of the expenditures for these charitable institutions in the District of Columbia should be borne by the United States. It is evident, sir, at least that the people of Tennessee come here quite largely, and perhaps the expense ought to be divided between the District of Columbia and the State of Tennessee; but I have no objection to the United States bearing some proportion of the expense. A report is now in print setting forth the relations between the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia, and making as far as such a report can do so some estimates of the proportion of expenses for all public works and charitable institutions here that ought to be borne by the United States, and the proportion that ought to be borne by the District of Columbia.

If I could have my way I should say that the District government ought to be repealed entirely; that then the United States Government ought to take control of the District as is provided in the Constitution, exercising exclusive legislation over its affairs, and determining what amounts of money shall be expended in the District of Columbia for all purposes; what proportion of that money shall be paid out of the United States Treasury, and what proportion should be raised by taxes levied upon the people of the District. Let the United States officials levy and collect such taxation, and see that the money is appropriated for those very purposes. I presume that the committee that has had this subject under consideration—the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress—will before this Congress finally adjourns agree upon some plan of that sort which will fix the relations that ought to exist in the future between the United States and the District of Columbia. But why should not some of these appropriations for some of these new works wait until that question is settled?

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman will allow me to say that if Congress should carry out the programme he has so tersely stated, I do not believe that any citizen, any society, or any officer of the local government would ever ask one cent from Congress.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. No; I do not suppose they would; I have no doubt the people of the District would be entirely satisfied with that, as I have no doubt the people of the United States would be. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I renew it. I desire only to make a few remarks upon this side of the House in addition to what I have already stated on the other side; and I wish to make them especially for the benefit of the gentleman from Vermont. This appropriation is not asked for the purpose of commencing the erection of buildings. The people of the District of Columbia have already through charitable bequests and in other private forms contributed $25,000. The building has already been completed in part. There is a small mortgage upon it; and this money is asked for the purpose of paying off that mortgage and completing the building fully.

I desire further to state this money is not asked, nor will any sum ever be asked, for the purpose of enabling this benevolent association to support fifty or one hundred poor, paralyzed, maimed, and blind citizens of this District and citizens of other States who have been brought here by their necessitous circumstances. The rule of their order forbids them to ask or receive a single dollar by way of permanent revenue. They are compelled to go to hotels, restaurants, markets, and to private persons and beg—to beg of the gentleman from Vermont and of other charitable persons the pittance even of a cent in order that they may clothe and support all these aged poor. If the Congress of the United States were to pass a law giving them a revenue of $10,000 a year the rules of their order would forbid them from receiving it.

Therefore they are not here making any demand upon the Congress of the United States as other institutions have or may do. As the citizens of this District have already raised $25,000 for the purpose of erecting the building for "The Little Sisters of the Poor," as they are perhaps more meritorious than any other charitable institution or order of men or women under heaven, it is asked only that the Congress of the United States shall give them this appropriation to finish the building, so they may be better able to clothe and feed these aged poor they have under their care.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I put them all upon the same ground.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I so understood the gentleman, but I only wish to make this statement in order that at least in this respect gentlemen may know the exact facts.

One word further. If they did not take care of these one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five poor men and women, what would become of them? They are not allowed to take care of them if they have father or mother, brother or sister, son or daughter, or any one to take charge of them. They are allowed to take them only when they are utterly destitute, when they are without provision at the hands of any party. If these "Little Sisters of the Poor" did not take care of them they will have to be taken care of at the public expense, and the cost would be more than double the interest upon what is now proposed to be appropriated. They would necessarily have to be provided for, and it is the duty and privilege of the Federal Government to aid the District in caring for the poor which from all quarters seem to gather here. This only to a proper extent; and I deem the appropriation asked for one that comes within this rule. Charity and justice demand it; and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I should not have risen to take further part in this debate except for the introduction by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] of the catalogue of a portion of the orphan children from Tennessee in the Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home in this city. I do not know the purpose for which he introduced it. The impression on the House evidently was unfavorable to the portion of the country and the people I represent.

That institution dates back to the year 1866, and was founded by a general appeal to the charities of the country. That appeal was made to the people of my own State. Communications were addressed to the ladies, and they were asked to contribute of their means, which they did, in a limited way to be sure, because their means were straitened. The institution was established. The same ladies were then invited to send to it orphans of the soldiers, Union soldiers, of the men who rushed unbidden into the service at the beginning of the war, who were organized without being mustered, who marched to the battle-field without any of those formalities which would have enabled not a few to receive bounties and pensions had they enlisted by the more formal and regular method.

The orphan children of those devoted soldiers were invited, kindly, cordially invited, to the Soldiers and Sailors' Orphan Home. They assembled at Knoxville, the central town of that section of the State, gathered from all the region round about, from the mountains and valleys, wherever a soldier's home mourned a father dead. They were sent here to the number, I think, of some twenty, perhaps thirty in all. My impression is there are half that number here now, registered as from Knoxville, the central town in that part of the State and their point of rendezvous.

If the gentleman means to say they are improperly here, if he begrudges them their share of this charity, if he or any other person shall insist they should have been left at home to their inheritance of ignorance and poverty, the usual inheritance of our soldiers' children—for they were too poor to obtain the advantages of education—if the gentleman has that sort of feeling, let him say so in a manly, honorable way, and not by indirection strike at the orphan children of the loyal men who died in his behalf and in behalf of the common flag of our country.

I do not know what the gentleman's object is. If he means to say they should be sent home, let him introduce a resolution to send them home, and say the country has no further use for the services of men like their fathers, who gave up their lives for the country. It may be a patriotic effort, but I cannot think so. And while I live, these little boys and girls shall not want at least one defender.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, I have no feeling except that of admiration for the patriotism and services of the loyal citizens of Tennessee during the dark period of the rebellion. How I happened to call attention to the reading of this list, which comprised so many beneficiaries from that State, is this: I prefer that where a claim to Government charity is charged there should be plain speaking. If it is really the case that the benevolent institution here is to be run for the benefit of all the States, let it be so said. It seems to me if, as it has been urged here and argued upon general statements, these institutions in their benefits were equally divided, I should call attention to a single one of these institutions.

I did not select this invidiously, I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee, but I remembered that it was on my desk and sent for it that the list might be read. It was only for the information of the committee.

What I wish is that while gentlemen are ready to vote away the public money through these institutions they would look a little more closely into them; and while they will not find corruption, while they will find nothing but the good deeds of charitable men and charitable women therein interested, they will find that the benefits of many of these institutions are not equally distributed through the States, but, as in the case of the one to which I have called attention, a few States, and especially the District of Columbia, are receiving the benefit of what is given from the public purse.

Mr. COX. I do not intend to detain the House but for one moment. Without proper reflection I joined in the laugh raised by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] on the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] So far as I can, I regret having done so. New York is also included in this matter to some extent. New York City, in proportion to her population, cares more pecuniarily and otherwise for poor, needy, and unfortunate children than any other city in the world. So much for that.

But I do not believe that the gentleman from Tennessee should be inconsiderately reproached because some one, perhaps himself, perhaps his wife, perhaps some gentle person in his neighborhood, has gathered the little orphans of the Republic in those far-distant mountains of the country and fixed their locus in quo in Knoxville, Tennessee. I think, sir, when we have the opportunity of voting legitimately for an institution of this kind for the District of Columbia, where we have the right to vote it, we should not grudge doing something for its beneficiaries, for these children from six to fifteen years of age who are so needy. I need not remind gentlemen of this House how the Saviour of mankind bade little children come unto Him. But I do say to my friend from Vermont over yonder, while I sympathize with him in his strict construction and careful mode of legislation, that when it comes to the District of Columbia, where Congress has the right to legislate, and for such objects as these, I give my heart and my vote as willing, and I only envy the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] the application of the lines of Tennyson which he has earned by his conduct or that of his family:

> Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
> 'Tis only noble to be good;
> Kind hearts are more than coronets,
> And simple faith than Norman blood.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. E. R. HOAR, there were—ayes 51, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. E. R. HOAR and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 56, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Women's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, $25,000, to be expended for the sole purpose of erecting a building on the ground recently purchased in said District, upon and in strict conformity with a plan for said building, which shall be prepared by the architect of the Capitol extension; and it shall not, for building and furnishing, exceed the said sum of $25,000; and no money shall be paid under this appropriation until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that a contract, with good security for its execution, has been entered into for the erection and furnishing of said building, at a sum not exceeding the amount hereby appropriated; and all payments for the erection and furnishing of said building shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury directly upon vouchers to be approved by him: Provided, (and this appropriation is upon the express condition,) That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until said association shall file, with the recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, a declaration, executed and acknowledged in the manner in which deeds are required by law to be executed for record in the District of Columbia, that said building and the lands heretofore purchased by said association are and forever shall be held in trust by said association, without mortgage or security in the nature of mortgage, for the sole purposes of said association, as defined in its charter, of date of December 13, 1870; and the filing of said declaration shall be regarded as notice to all persons who shall purchase said property or take any security thereon.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I raise the point of order that there is no law authorizing the appropriation made by this paragraph.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to be heard on the point of order. I answer the gentleman from Ohio that this is a public work, already in progress, for which Congress in several years has made appropriations of property and money. The last Congress appropriated to this institution the proceeds, amounting to $1,700, of the sale of the old buildings on Judiciary Square; and prior to that time Congress had permitted the use of those buildings by this association.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from New York call the attention of the Chair to the law authorizing the erection of this building?

Mr. WHEELER. There is no such law. But what I submit is that this is a continuation of appropriations for this hospital, which brings it within the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. If the fact be as the gentleman from New York states, there is no question about the rule.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York whether this building is not the exclusive property of the association; whether there is any more law about it than that Congress has made appropriations to the association?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ascertain the character of the appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. WHEELER. Congress allowed for a series of years the use by the association of the buildings on Judiciary Square, and when those buidings were torn down and sold, by an act passed in last Congress, the proceeds of the sale of these buildings, amounting to $1,700, were given to the association.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand that there has been any appropriation for a new building?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not understand anything of the kind. But I understand that according to the rule, if this be in continuation of appropriations heretofore made by Congress, this appropriation is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York state what is the particular object for which appropriations have been made of which this is a continuation?

Mr. WHEELER. Appropriations have been made for the general objects of the association.

Mr. COTTON. It would be desirable, I think, to have the law read.

The CHAIRMAN. If there has been any authority of Congress heretofore to erect this building, of course any appropriation in continuance of that object would be in order; but the Chair is not of the opinion that appropriating the proceeds of the sale of some other buildings is authorizing the erection of a new one.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Chair allow me to call his attention to the rule?

120. No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, I say that this is an appropriation in continuance of an appropriation already made in the same general direction, and for the same general object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the law referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suspend his decision until he hears the law.

Mr. CONGER. It is to be found on page 426 of the Statues at Large, and is as follows:

That the engineer in chief of public buildings and grounds, be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the wooden buildings standing on Judiciary Square, in Washington City, to be sold and removed therefrom, and that he pay to the Women's Christian Association of Washington the proceeds of such sale: Provided, That the government of the District of Columbia shall provide for said association suitable buildings for at least one year after their removal from said square.

That is the law referred to by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the paragraph will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. MERRIAM. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, to come in at the end of the paragraph preceding the one which has just been stricken out on the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all moneys hereafter appropriated for the aid, use, support, or benefit of any charitable, industrial, or other association, institution, or corporation, shall be placed to the credit of the proper fiscal officer of such association, institution, or corporation, by warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the books of the Treasurer of the United States, or of an assistant treasurer or designated depositary of the United States other than a national bank, and shall be paid not only on the checks of such fiscal officer, drawn payable to the order of the person to whom payment is to be made, for services, materials, or any other purpose, and stating in writing thereon the specific object or purpose to which the avails thereof are to be applied: Provided, That when payments are to be made under twenty dollars, such fiscal officer may check in his own name, but shall state in writing on the check that the avails thereof are to be applied to the payment of small claims, and shall furnish to the Treasurer, assistant treasurer, or designated depositary on whom the check is drawn, a certified list of such claims, which list shall set forth the amount and nature of each claim and the name of each claimant.

Mr. MERRIAM. My attention has been directed to the necessity for this provision by the loss of the sum of $18,000 that was appropriated to the Boys' Reform School of this District. The money was taken out, deposited with Jay Cooke & Co., and was lost on their failure, and in the deficiency bill we were obliged to vote that amount over again. It is the opinion of the Treasurer of the United States that this law would prevent any such losses in future.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the amendment is a good one, and I hope it will be adopted.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I offer the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, from the Select Committee on the Washington Monument.

The Clerk read as follows:

That to carry out the resolve of Congress of December 24, 1799, to erect a marble monument at the Federal Capital in memory of George Washington, there be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be used in the completion of the unfinished Washington monument, at the city of Washington, to a height not exceeding four hundred and forty feet from its base, substantially in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Washington Monument in their report to the House of Representatives, May 1, 1874; which sum shall be expended under the direction of the President of the United States: Provided, That the money herein appropriated shall be drawn from time to time, only, as may be required during the progress of the work, and upon the requisition of the President: And provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be drawn from the Treasury until the Chief of Engineers has carefully examined the foundations of said monument, and has reported to the President that the obelisk can be safely constructed to the height proposed herein; and further that the ultimate cost of completing said obelisk shall not exceed the sum of $300,000.

SEC. —. That the Washington Monument Society be, and it is hereby, required, immediately upon the passage of this act, to reconvey to the United States all the right, title, and interest in said society to the lot of ground known as reservation 3, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, conveyed to said society on the 12th day of April, 1848, by the then President of the United States, in virtue of the joint resolution of Congress approved January 31, 1848, and confirmed to said society by the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington National Monumental Society," approved February 26, 1859; and all rights, privileges, and authority granted to said society by said act approved February 26, 1859, shall cease and determine upon the passage of this act: Provided, however, That said society shall be authorized to continue its organization, but shall exercise no authority, until the 4th of July, 1876, or until the said Washington Monument shall be finally completed and dedicated, at which time the said society shall cease forever.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point of order that that amendment makes an appropriation for a matter not provided for by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the Delegate from the District of Columbia point to any law which authorizes the construction of this monument?

Mr. KASSON. Moreover, it contains new provisions of law.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I think I can do so. I ask the Clerk to read the first section of the resolution of Congress of December 24, 1799.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not the statute of limitations run against a law so old as that?

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That a marble monument be erected by the United States in the Capitol at the city of Washington, and that the family of General Washington be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it, and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Delegate from the District of Columbia claim that the present monument has been constructed so far in pursuance of that resolution?

Mr. CHIPMAN. If the Chair will allow me I will state the reasons in favor of this amendment as against the point of order. The act of Congress which has just been read provided for the erection of a monument at the capital in memory of George Washington. That monument has never been erected; that act of Congress has never been repealed. We have no statute of limitations running against a patriotic act; we have no statute of limitations running against an act of Congress that has not become obsolete. The same act contained four sections, the other three of which were executed by the Congress which passed it. The first section was attempted to be executed, but the bill was defeated in the Senate or was postponed, or for some reason never became a law; but the section which has been read is as valid to-day as the act by which your public debt was created. I claim therefore that, in pursuance of that act of Congress, it is entirely competent to move an appropriation like this in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman claim that the unfinished monument mentioned in his amendment is the unfinished work of the United States?

Mr. CHIPMAN. In regard to that I will say that if Congress had ten years ago provided that there should be a new State Department building at the capital, and if Congress had made no appropriation for it, and some patriotic citizens had started a new State Department, and Congress was subsequently asked to make an appropriation to continue the work so commenced, I claim that Congress could have done it quite as legitimately and legally as to have commenced the work upon a new foundation.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would ask upon the point of order whether the statute which has been read has not been executed twice over, Congress having erected a monument at Washington, and the Delegate from the District will find it in the Capitol grounds in front of his own house.

Mr. KASSON. Sitting in a chair.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sitting in a chair; and then an equestrian monument has been erected, which the gentleman will see if he will go up toward Georgetown. How many times is that statute to be executed over again?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Let me reply to the gentleman, for I wish to give the House information on this subject. The equestrian statue made by Clark Mills was appropriated for in a distinct act of Congress. It never was claimed as carrying out this act of Congress. The statute of Greenough was erected in the same way. Neither of them is a monument; they are statues.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the unfinished monument is not a work of the United States heretofore commenced in pursuance of law, and therefore rules out the amendment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Let me in confirmation of the decision of the Chair call attention to the speech and report of the Delegate from the District of Columbia on this subject, in which he expressly claimed that this monument is not the property of the Government.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Of course it is not the property of the Government, but I propose to make it so.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Smithsonian Institution:

For preservation of the collections of the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, $20,000; and for fitting up and completing the cases in the new halls required for the Government collections, $10,000; in all, $30,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$10,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000."

It seems to me that this is a very large appropriation for the object had in view, and that $10,000 would fit up the entire building with cases. There can be no call for an expenditure of $10,000 for cases; and I think if we will look at this bill we will find that the Committee on Appropriations has been wonderfully liberal toward some of these institutions in Washington. We find further on an appropriation of $10,000 for the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution, and no mortal to-day can tell where the $10,000 appropriated last year went to, except that a few rods of fencing have been torn down; no improvements have been made that attract the public eye at all, and I think we have been altogether too liberal with these appropriations. This item is for $10,000 for mere cases for collections that have been made. I hope the item will be reduced to a reasonable amount; and if they need more we can give them more next year. Ten thousand dollars for a single year seems to me to be a very large sum of money.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the Committee on Appropriations had such information as would warrant them in naming this amount in the bill; but it would be well for members to consider that the Government at a very large expense for a great number of years, fitted out expeditions of different kinds to make collections which are perhaps more valuable to the scientific world than any which have been collected by private individuals in the country. These collections are liable to loss from exposure. The value received by the Government for the money expended consists in these valuable collections of botanical, mineral, and animal life, and they are going to decay and liable to go to decay for want of proper places for their preservation. If it be of any use for this Government to join with other governments of the world in promoting these investigations and making these valuable collections, it certainly is worth while to make an appropriation for their preservation, when made, and to preserve them not only to the Government, but for the use of the citizens who came here to examine them. I think it is in the interest of true economy to make a sufficient appropriation.

The gentleman is mistaken when he says that there is not room enough in that immense building unoccupied to-day for the lack of these very cases to put in all the cases that could be made for this money and exhibit to the citizens of the United States these wonderful collections of objects interesting to the scientific world.

The questions was taken on Mr. DUNNELL'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For continuing the survey of the western coast of the United States, including compensation of civilians, and pay and rations of engineers of steamers engaged in the work, $231,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in the prosecution of surveys beyond the northern line of Washington Territory after December 31, 1874.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it would be only just to the Committee of the Whole to state the object of the proviso to the paragraph just read. As the Coast Survey is now organized, it is extending its work into Alaska. The Committee on Appropriations thought from the detail of estimates that more money was being used for pushing the surveys into Alaska than probably it was worth, and therefore they ventured to put in this proviso limiting the operation of the coast survey to the northern line of Washington Territory.

The Clerk read the following:

For general repairs at the light-station, Highlands of Navesink, New Jersey, $1,500: Provided, That whenever it may become necessary in the adjustment of boundary-lines, or in the opening or changing of necessary roadways affecting lands belonging to the United States and used for the purpose of the light-house establishments at Staten Island, New York, and at the Highlands of Navesink, New Jersey, or any part thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to execute for such purposes touching the property above referred to, or any part thereof, the necessary conveyances and assurances, and to receive, in consideration therefor, such other conveyances or assurances of adjoining lands, or of lands in the immediate vicinity, or other consideration, as may be agreed upon.

Mr. HOOPER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to insert after the paragraph just read what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a light-ship to replace the one recently stationed near the entrance of New York harbor to mark the site of the wreck of the steamship Scotland, $40,000. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to place a fog-bell to be rung during the prevalence of a fog at such point at or near the entrance of the harbor of New York as may be designated by the proper officers, the expenses thereof to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury.

Mr. HOOPER. I call attention to a communication from the Light-House Board showing the necessity for this amendment.

The communication was as follows:

WRECK OF THE SCOTLAND LIGHT-SHIP.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, D. C., April 9, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d ultimo, inclosing bill H. R. No. 2515, to replace the light-ship "Wreck of the Scotland," &c. and to say that this bill was laid before the board, and after a full consideration of the matter at two meetings, it was determined that the aid to navigation referred to had proved of great importance to the shipping arriving at New York in the night; that it was found particularly serviceable to vessels coming from the south in thick weather; that in consequence of its position the shoals known as "Outer Middle," "Oil Spot," and "False Hook," ceased to be dangerous, and that the report, of which the inclosed is a copy, was adopted.

Your attention is respectfully called to the latter part of the report in which the cost of establishing the light-ship, and the necessity of increasing the amount named in the bill is referred to.

Very respectfully,

J. G. WALKER,
Naval Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER, M. C.,
Chairman of Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This amendment has been examined by the Committee on Appropriations, and is approved by them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The following was read:

For building a light-ship, to be stationed at Winterquarter Shoals, on the coast of Virginia, $50,000

Mr. HOOPER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out $50,000 and inserting $30,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the Department sanction the reduction?

Mr. HOOPER. It is recommended by the Engineer Bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The following was read:

For light-house and day-beacon at or in the vicinity of Mathias Point, Virginia, $40,000; and the appropriation made by the act of June 10, 1872, for a light to mark the entrance of Shipping Point, Potomac River, Virginia, shall revert to the Treasury.

Mr. HOOPER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to move to reduce the appropriation named in the paragraph just read, from $40,000 to $20,000.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have an amendment which I desire to move to the paragraph to come in before the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOOPER. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend by inserting after the words "Mathias Point, Virginia," the words "to be erected on the Maryland side of the Potomac River." I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that the Maryland side of the river is the proper place for this light-house. I appeal to the better knowledge of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who has charge of this light-house matter, and who is more familiar with the subject than I am.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has it not been a chronic dispute which was the Maryland side? I would a little rather not settle the question by an act of Congress.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. These light-houses are built under the supervision of the Light-House Board. The engineers belonging to the Light-House Board select a site, probably without reference to any local feeling of the population.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the question is put I desire to call attention to the fact——

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have not had an opportunity of being heard upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland occupied as much time as he saw fit.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] rose and opposed the amendment. After that the gentleman from Maryland cannot resume the floor to advocate it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I hope I will be allowed to make a correction.

Mr. CONGER. I yield to the gentleman the half of my time.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not want the half of it. I desire merely to state that if this light-house is to be erected at all, it ought to be erected where it would afford protection to shipping passing up and down the Potomac River. The depth of water about Mathias Point, on the Virginia side of the river, as I am informed by gentlemen on the Committee on Naval Affairs, is anywhere from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty feet. Therefore there is no occasion for a light-house on the Virginia side of the river. It seems to be agreed on all hands that this light-house is necessary, and therefore logically it should be put upon the other side, or the Maryland side of the river. A further reason is that the depth of water on the Maryland side is such that there is danger to navigation there. I trust that my estimable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] will be able to corroborate what I have said.

Mr. HOOPER. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] to the fact that this bill provides that this light-house shall be erected in the vicinity of Mathias Point. If the officers to select the site should decide that it is better to erect it on the Maryland side, they can do so.

Mr. CONGER. This clause provides that a light-house shall be erected at or in the vicinity of Mathias Point, Virginia. That gives latitude for the Light-House Board to select a location after examination by their engineers, and to place the light-house at the most desirable point. I have never yet heard of any mistake that the Light-House Board has made in the selection of the most desirable points on our coasts for the erection of light-houses. I think the selections thus far have been admirably made, and that this question had better be left to the judgment of the Light-House Board and their engineers, rather than that Congress without further information should undertake to fix the erection at any particular point. For this reason I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I renew the amendment. The location named for this light-house is in the district of one of my colleagues, [Mr. SENER,] who is not now in the Hall. I hope for that reason, if for no other, the committee will act on this amendment adversely. This point has been selected by the Light-House Board and sanctioned by the Committee on Appropriations; it has been examined thoroughly; and I think it would be going very far for this House, upon the statement of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] that in his opinion the light-house should be on the Maryland side, to reverse the action of the Light-House Board and the Committee on Appropriations, especially in view of the fact that we have not yet decided where along the Potomac Maryland begins and where it ends.

The amendment of Mr. O'BRIEN was not agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out "40" and inserting "20," so as to make the amount of the appropriation $20,000.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not see any reason why the Committee of the Whole should reverse the action of the Committee on Appropriations on this subject.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMISON. I move to amend by striking out the whole of the pending paragraph. It proposes to erect a light-house at Mathias Point, Virginia, at a cost of $40,000.

A MEMBER. Twenty thousand dollars it is now.

Mr. LAMISON. Well, any sum is too much. The other day when this provision of the bill attracted my attention, I took occasion to go the Coast Survey Office and obtain a map of the river, giving the different surveys and including this point called Mathias Point. Now this appropriation, if it be made at all, ought to be for the benefit of navigation on that river; but any man who will examine for one half minute the surveys which I have now lying on my desk will see that there is no more necessity for this light-house than there is for the fifth wheel to a wagon.

In the first place, there is at that point a high bluff, the highest point I believe between this city and the Bay. Just above that point a light-house is already established; and at the point are two buoys, more than half a mile apart, marking an open channel there for more than half a mile in width. The depth of water at the lowest point at low tide is twenty-four feet between the buoys; and it sometimes ranges as high as one hundred and fifty feet.

Now, I do not know how this appropriation crept into this bill. I do not know what influences were used in securing it; nor do I know how many appropriations for light-houses equally useless have been obtained. But, sir, on consultation with officers who navigate this river—with naval officers—they say that a light-house at that point is of no use whatever; that the buoys furnish a sufficient guidance to those navigating the river, that even if a light-house should be established there it should be on the Maryland side, where the shoals widen out, but that no light-house should be built there at all—that there is no necessity for one.

While I have uniformly, almost without exception, followed the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations and its chairman upon measures of this kind, I would like to know from him under what recommendation of the Navy Department, or of any engineer, or of anybody else, this appropriation crept into the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. This appropriation was inserted by the Committee on Appropriations on the general recommendation of the Light-House Board. We were compelled to go over a very large number of light-houses; and having determined about how much we should appropriate in the aggregate, we divided the different light-houses into classes one, two, and three—those of first importance, those of the second importance, and those of the third importance, according to the light thrown upon the subject by the Light-House Board. We dropped, I believe, all of the third class; and retained of the second class such only as seemed to be highest up in the scale, while of the first class we included all. I think the light-house at Mathias Point stood on that doubtful ground—that purgatorial middle position between the upper part of the second class and the lower part of the first. But I do not profess to have such personal knowledge in this matter as perhaps I ought to have. My distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who has had special charge of the subject of light-houses, knows more about this question than I do. I am disposed to think, from what I have heard from my colleague, [Mr. LAMISON,] that perhaps we have made a mistake in inserting this appropriation; and unless I hear something to change my present view, I shall move to strike it out. I yield for anything that the gentleman from Maine, or the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] who represents this locality, may have to say.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] is very anxious to speak on this subject, and as this light-house is in his district I yield to him.

Mr. SENER. There is in this country a spirit of reform. That spirit of reform takes various shapes. Sometimes it takes the shape of investigations. Sometimes these investigations are conducted in the quiet of committee-rooms in this Capitol; at others they are conducted aboard vessels of the United States, revenue-cutters, where champagne and other desirable things are furnished to satisfy the appetite. I suppose it was during an expedition of this sort that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMISON] became so much interested in regard to this light-house and so well instructed as to what appropriations ought to be made in this bill for light-houses and what ought not. Whether it was in the day-time or whether it was in the night-time, whether he saw double or whether he saw single, perhaps he is not now prepared to say. But he comes here in the spirit of reform, I suppose. Dr. Johnson once said that patriotism was the last refuge of a certain class of people. I do not say it is the last refuge of my friend from Ohio; but this attempt to strike out this light-house is uncalled for and wrong. I say if that long sea-coast of Virginia is to have any consideration here on the floor of the American Congress, if the commercial interests of the country are to be consulted, if the report of the Light-House Board, from which I will have an extract read directly, is to be considered at all, this appropriation will not be stricken out.

Now what do they say in the report of the Light-House Board? I ask the Clerk to read the extract and I ask the House to listen to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

PORT TOBACCO FLATS, IN THE BEND OF POTOMAC RIVER OPPOSITE MATTHIAS POINT.

This is one of the most difficult places for experienced navigators who are familiar with the river to pass at night. Few places occur where experienced pilots cannot tell where they are by soundings; at this place, however, soundings run from one hundred feet to five feet within a space of a hundred yards. The current, which is strong, sets directly on the flats, both at the flood and ebb tides, which render it bad enough for sailing-vessels even by daylight, but at night the difficulty is much aggravated by the want of some guide to point out the dangerous spot. It is no uncommon sight to see a vessel aground on these flats. The United States naval steamer Frolic went ashore here during the summer of 1873, and remained for some time. It is recommended that an appropriation of $40,000 be made for a light-house at this point, with the proviso that the appropriation for a light-house at Shipping Point revert to the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SENER. I hope I may be indulged a little further as I do not often ask the privilege.

MEMBERS on both sides. Go on.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Chairman, that is the report of the Light-House Board. It shows this fact, that in the space of a hundred yards there is a difference between the water measurements of from five to one hundred feet. Many years ago the steamers Missouri and Mississippi went aground on that point and valuable lives were lost.

A MEMBER. How valuable?

Mr. SENER. Does the gentleman ask how valuable is human life?

The steamer Frolic, as that report also shows, went aground in the summer of 1873. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, which I will send up to the Clerk's desk and will ask to have read. That letter shows it cost the Government $6,000 to float that vessel in 1873 when she grounded. There is already an appropriation of $15,000 for Shipping Point, which this bill proposes to cover into the Treasury. I ask that the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 30, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of the 13th instant, I have the honor to state that the United States steamer Frolic was aground in the Potomac over two weeks, and was floated at a cost of about $6,000, as near as can be estimated.

Very respectfully, &c.,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. JAMES B. SENER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SENER. I hope I will be allowed more time, as I do not take up as much of the time of the House as some of the gentlemen near me here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed; the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SENER. It cost $6,000 to float that war vessel of the United States which had gone aground at this point owing to the lack of light-house facilities.

As I have shown, this is recommended by the Light-House Board. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMISON] says this board makes recommendations lightly. If he had read that report, which I suppose he has not, he will find this fact: they recommend that the appropriation of $15,000 for a light-house at Shipping Point shall be covered into the Treasury, it not being needed at that point; and then an appropriation of $40,000 for a light-house at this place was recommended as one which should be made. The appropriation for Shipping Point, which is proposed to be covered into the Treasury, was made without application for that purpose and was not recommended by the Light-House Board. It was passed in the spirit which prevailed in the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses when Credit Mobilier and other things raged. Every rascally scheme could get an appropriation then; but now when an honest appropriation is asked for I find certain gentlemen opposing it. And on what ground? Upon the ground of information which was received while on a trip of pleasure at the expense of the United States Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAMISON. This may be a very simple matter, involving only an expenditure of $40,000, but it also involves an annual expense of $5,000 to continue interminably. At the same time there are places where the money might be expended where it would do more good. And it is for that reason that I propose to strike out this light-house. It has no earthly use in the world where it is located. I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] for turning to me and saying that we made a tour of observation down the river. I think we did discover on our way down that the multitude of light-houses which light up the Potomac River between this and Chesapeake Bay or Hampton Roads are enough to supply the whole country if well distributed.

A MEMBER. He says you saw two for one.

Mr. LAMISON. If I saw two for one, then the man who located the light-house there must have been in the same condition as the gentleman supposes we were. But I know something of the gentleman's habits, and I know that he never drinks too much unless the liquor is furnished by somebody else.

Mr. SENER. Then this was furnished by somebody else.

Mr. LAMISON. I wish to say another thing with reference to seeing too much on that occasion. It is enough to say that that light-house is not necessary at that point. There is no naval officer in the employ of this Government to-day who would recommend it, and especially no naval officer would have recommended its location at the point where it is now. There is a jutting bank standing as high almost as this Capitol near this projected light-house, and the men who run their vessels aground there must have been in the condition that gentlemen would be in who vote this appropriation. No one can run aground there if he navigates according to the chart. There is a sufficient channel and there are buoys marking the outlet and the inlet with a light shining above which shows more than ten miles below. Why, then, have this light-house and add this annual expense to guide the gentleman in his journey from Virginia to the capital? It serves no other purpose.

But the gentleman turns to me and says that in this junketing expedition of ours we saw double. I hope we did. One thing is very certain, that in this expedition we did discover that it is possible that a man might be drunk when he made the recommendation to construct this light-house, but he would be inexcusable if he insisted on it after he got sober. Now, I say this light-house is simply worth nothing for the purposes of the navigation of that river, and that it ought to be stricken out as entirely useless.

Mr. SENER. I oppose the amendment to the amendment.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAMISON,] who lives in the backwoods, and whose first expedition on a tour of pleasure was over the Missouri and Texas Railroad to New Orleans, where I first met him, and who is so genial a fellow, evidently never had seen a light-house before. And when he went on this last excursion, paid for by the Government, with champagne flowing like water, I have no doubt that with every drink he took—at other people's expense, which he says I do, and I do it occasionally with that good-nature which is characteristic of all gentlemen—I have no doubt he saw double and triple, and I have no doubt that he supposed the lights that lined that river were like the lights that line the streets of our magnificent cities. He saw their reflection in the water; he saw the ships all double; he saw that peak rising mountain-high, and he thought he would come back here and write himself down a magnficent economist, so that he might come back a member of the Forty-fourth Congress in all the glory of his power and his strength.

Mr. LAMISON. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to strike out the last line.

Mr. Chairman, this is no joking matter. In preparing this bill we endeavored to keep it down, as the Committee on Appropriations have kept down other bills, to a figure less than last year, and it has been reported over $300,000 less than last year. The trouble about this Mathias Point is that it is difficult to fix the place where the light ought to be. Last year the gentleman from Virginia came and said that there ought to be a light at the entrance of Shipping Point, and that it would take $15,000, and the committee reported an appropriation of that amount; but there was nothing done about it. This year they came and asked that that appropriation shall revert to the Treasury, and that $40,000 shall be given for a light-house at Mathias Point. On the heels of that the Committee on Commerce come in and show that only $20,000 is needed, and want to strike it down; and that is carried.

Now I think there is no necessity for swelling this bill with an item that is in doubt as to amount and as to where the light shall be placed; and under the circumstances it seems to me it would be better for my friend from Virginia, rather than pass this at the low rate that has been fixed in the House, $20,000, which will not build such a light-house as the Department has recommended—that it would be better for him to let it all be struck out, and before the coming year examination can be made, and it can be shown just where the light ought to be, and just how much ought to be appropriated. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SENER. I just want to say before the vote is taken that the language of the appropriation is "at or in the vicinity of Mathias Point." That follows the exact language of the recommendation of the Light-House Board.

The question was taken on Mr. LAMISON's motion to strike out the clause as amended; and on a division there were ayes 72, noes not counted.

Mr. SENER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SENER and Mr. LAMISON were appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the Light-House Board recommended this appropriation?

Mr. SENER. It has.

Mr. HOOPER. Here is the recommendation of the Light-House Board.

Mr. SPEER. Let it be read.

Mr. SENER. I ask that the report of the Light-House Board be again read.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It has been read once.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Before the vote is taken I desire to have the report of the Light-House Board read upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If almost the only appropriation for Virginia in this bill is to be voted out, I want the House to do it with an understanding of the subject.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 70.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. SENER. I give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote in the House on this amendment and shall call for the yeas and nays on it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a survey of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and to establish temporary lights and buoys thereon, $50,000; to be available whenever new light-house districts shall be established on said rivers by law.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to insert after the clause just read the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board, created by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes," approved August 31, 1852 is hereby extended over the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, for the establishment of such beacon-lights, day-beacons, and buoys as may be necessary for the use of vessels navigating those streams; and for this purpose the said board is hereby required to divide the designated rivers into one or two additional light-house districts, to be in all respects similar to the already existing light-house districts; and is hereby authorized to lease the necessary grounds for all such lights and beacons as are used to point out changeable channels, and which in consequence cannot be made permanent.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think that amendment is right, and I hope it will be adopted.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For building a new tower and keeper's dwelling at White River light-station, Michigan, $15,000.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to insert the following, to come in after the paragraph just read:

For building a light-house at Tue's Marshes, near the mouth of the York River, $15,000.

Mr. Chairman, this light is one of the most necessary that has been asked for, or that has come before the House. Tue's Marshes project out into the month of the York River, immediately in the track of passing vessels.

This point has been the scene of a great many disasters caused by the impossibility of evading these marshes, even by the most experienced navigators, because there is no light at this point or in the vicinity. Two light-house inspectors in that district, one stationed at Norfolk and the other at Baltimore, under the orders of the Light-House Board visited this point a few weeks ago and after a careful inspection made a very strong report in behalf of the necessity of establishing this light-house. There are several lines of steamers connecting with Baltimore which pass this point, and gentlemen interested in that steamboat property have been here trying to secure the erection at this point of this important light.

As the committee has stricken out almost the only appropriation in this bill for the waters of Virginia, I trust it may be their pleasure to adopt this amendment, and appropriate the small amount that I ask for, for a light-house at this point.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have made it a rule in this part of the bill to yield to all amendments recommended by the Committee on Commerce and by the Treasury Department, because some things came into the committee after the bill had been made up that seemed to be right and fair. But in this case I cannot accept the amendment, and to show that it has not been recommended by the Department, as I am very hoarse and cannot speak myself, I will ask the Clerk to read the paragraph I have marked in the report of the Light-House Board.

The Clerk read as follows:

York River, Virginia.—In regard to establishing a light-house on York River, Virginia, at the point named, it would be of but little importance, and the amount of money necessary to establish a light there can be much better expended at more important points.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That is in relation to a point higher up the river. I state again that the report of both the inspectors, which I tried to get here in season, are very strongly in favor of the erection of a light-house at this point. They say that the necessity for a light for the commerce of the river is imperative.

Mr. ARCHER. I desire to add a word to what has been said by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ARCHER. I renew it. I would remark in addition to what the gentleman from Virginia has said that not only have several captains of the steamboats that run on that river been here to ask for this appropriation, but I had a very strong letter from the collector at Baltimore, stating that very frequent complaints had been made by seafaring men of their running aground at this point, and asking me to state that fact to the House and request that an appropriation be made for this purpose.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I suggest to the gentleman to follow the course which is pursued by all gentlemen representing the interests of their districts; that is, to go before the Department or the Committee on Commerce and get its recommendation. If we depart from the bill as reported from the committee, and put in light-houses here and there on the motion of one gentleman and another, upon private letters, without investigation by a committee and without a recommendation of the Department, there is no knowing where we will stop. The gentleman can see that this is all done by another year, and then if it comes in regularly in the estimates, it can be put in the bill. I hope we will not now set the precedent of putting in appropriations not recommended.

Mr. ARCHER. This is not in my district. But I speak in the interest of the commerce of our city of Baltimore, and of the foreign commerce that comes into the State of Virginia, and simply because I have been requested so to do by the collector of the port of Baltimore.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have already endeavored, and so have the other Representatives from Virginia, to take the steps indicated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] We got the Light-House Board to send their inspectors to this point, and I state upon my own knowledge, which statement I ask this committee to accept, that the report of these inspectors was very strongly in favor of establishing a light-house at this point. There has not been time for us to go before the Committee on Commerce. I ask the Committee of the Whole not to put us off another year. During the last winter a large amount of property was lost because of the absence of a light-house here, and I trust we will not be put off another year, and thereby cause a destruction of still more property.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] a question. I understood him to say that they had considered three classes of light-houses; had allowed all of the first class, all or nearly all of the second class, and none of the third class. This amendment of my colleague [Mr. PLATT] is objected to by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] on the ground that it has not the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce or of the Light-House Board. Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what has become of those light-houses that stood below Mathias Point in the list?

Mr. GARFIELD. They are not in the bill.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I understood the gentleman to say they were allowed.

Mr. GARFIELD. None of the third class was put in the bill, some of the second, and all of the first.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. This comes within those allowed of the second class.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was speaking of Mathias Point.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. What becomes of those below Mathias Point?

Mr. GARFIELD. They are mostly out.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. They are not here.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; they are out. And this is of the third class.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I have no personal interest in this matter. But it appears to me that after Mathias Point was stricken out all below it in the second class should have been stricken out by the gentleman from Ohio. As I understood the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations Mathias Point was in the middle of the second class.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hold in my hand a bill providing for this ligh-house, which was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PLATT,] and referred by the House to the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce did not recommend it. It therefore does not appear here before us with a recommendation either of the Committee on Commerce or of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The point I make is that the objection to this amendment ought not to hold good on the ground that it was not recommended by the Committee on Commerce, because the Mathias Point appropriation had been recommended by the Committee on Commerce, and that was not left in.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The gentleman from Maine took my time.

The CHAIRMAN. By your consent.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Not by my consent, but against it.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. PLATT, of Virginia; and upon a division there were—ayes 44, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PLATT of Virginia and Mr. HALE of Maine were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 72.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to insert after the paragraph last read the following:

For the construction of a light-house at the mouth of Thunder Bay River, in the State of Michigan, $20,000: Provided, That all tolls on vessels entering or leaving the river shall be abolished after the light-house is completed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This amendment is recommended by the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee rose informally to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 876) to amend the law relative to patents, trade-marks, and copy-rights.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2211) for the relief of Beck & Wirth.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 856) to incorporate the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session and the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For a fog-signal on Yerba Buena Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, California, $10,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Should that be a fog-signal only, or a light and a fog-signal? The appropriation is one which I am authorized to accept on the part of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PAGE. Only a fog-signal is necessary.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Rock Island bridge: For alterations and repairs and additional machinery (for draw of the bridge) and for care and preservation, $23,400; one-half of which sum shall be reimbursed to the Government by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend this paragraph by striking out the words "one-half of which sum shall be reimbursed to the Government by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company," and inserting the following:

One-third of which sum shall be reimbursed to the Government by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, and one-third by the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make a point of order on that amendment; but I am willing to reserve it till we hear the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I would like to make a remark.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will state his point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was about to reserve it till the gentleman had said what he desired; but if he wishes me to do so, I will press it now.

Mr. CONGER. I am indifferent what course the gentleman may take. I make a point of order on the bill of the committee, that this provision is contrary to the law of the land; that the paragraph as it stands is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman, having offered an amendment, has waived his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I make the point of order as part of my argument in favor of the amendment. The act of June 4, 1872, granting to the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company the right of way, provides—

That the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Iowa, be, and is hereby, authorized, upon the payment of one-third of the cost of the bridge over the main channel of the Mississippi River at Rock Island, and shall also be liable for and pay one-third of the cost of keeping the same in repair, to pass the cars of the said Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company over said bridge, with the same rights and privileges, and subject to the same restrictions, that are or may be exercised or enjoyed by any other railroad company.

That is the first section.

Mr. COTTON. Has the company accepted that act up to the present time?

Mr. CONGER. The law declares that the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company shall pay one-third; the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company one-third; and the Government one-third.

Mr. COTTON. But the law does not attach until the company comes to use the bridge.

Mr. CONGER. There is nothing in this law that states when this company may or may not be liable. Now this law provides that the expense of repairs, for which this appropriation is made, shall be borne, one-third by the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, one-third by the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company, and one-third by the Government. That is the law of the land. The Committee on Appropriations propose in this bill to require the Government to pay one-half, which is more than we are under any obligation to pay, while the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company is let off without paying its share.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What is the date of the approval of that law?

Mr. CONGER. June 4, 1872.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think the gentleman will find by examining the act that it has expired by limitation.

Mr. CONGER. This is in relation to the Government bridge already built.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman does not understand it. The bridge has been built by the Government; but it was provided by law that the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company should pay one-half the cost of the superstructure and one-half the expense of keeping the same in repair. It was also provided that other roads might cross the bridge upon paying their part of the expense of constructing the bridge and keeping it in repair. The law passed two years ago provided that the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company should have the right to construct a bridge across the eastern channel of the Mississippi River to the island, and upon paying its proportionate share of the expense should have the right to cross the Government bridge over the main channel, to which this appropriation refers. But that provision of law did not attach at all until the bridge across the eastern branch was built, and until the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company should use the Government bridge.

Mr. CONGER. That is not the provision of this law.

Mr. COTTON. The requirement was that when the company should come to use the bridge they should pay their share of the expense; but until they use it they are not required to pay anything. At the present time they have not commenced to use it. When they do, they will no doubt pay their share.

Mr. CONGER. I am merely referring to the law. There is nothing to show that they have not used the bridge up to this time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will state to the gentleman as a matter of fact that they have never begun work under the law of 1872, and have never in any way used the Government bridge.

Mr. COTTON. The present law compels the company to pay their share when they come to use the bridge.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I merely desire to read, that it may go into the RECORD, an abstract from the Book of Estimates. After a full statement of the necessity of the appropriation, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

The railroad company or companies using the bridge should, under their agreement, pay one-half of this expense.

Mr. CONGER. That was under the old law. This is the act of 1872, by which the Government gave up one-half of its portion and the Chicago and Rock Island Railroad Company one-half of its portion; and the provision then was that the Government, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company should each pay one-third.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Michigan will certainly not contend that the Davenport and Saint Paul Railroad Company is liable to pay for the use of this bridge which it has never used in any manner. I think the gentleman will find on an examination of the law to which he has referred that it has expired by limitation.

Mr. CONGER. In view of the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COTTON] I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs of arsenals: For repairs of smaller arsenals, and to meet such unforeseen expenditures at arsenals as accidents or other contingencies during the year may render necessary, $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to provide for the construction of a military bridge across the North Platte River at or near Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, $15,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit the following papers from the Secretary of War, showing the necessity for this appropriation for the transportation of goods of the Army to the various military posts:

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 2, 1874.

GENERAL: At a meeting of the Military Committee this day it was voted to recommend to the Committee on Appropriations to make an appropriation of $15,000 for the purpose of constructing a military bridge at or near Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory.

JOHN COBURN, Chairman.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 28, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 26th ultimo, inclosing copy of House bill No. 2178, "for the location and construction of a Government military bridge across the North Platte River at Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory," I beg to invite your attention to the inclosures, copies of indorsements of Generals Sherman, Sheridan, and Ord, upon your letter, approving the construction of the bridge. General Sheridan suggests that the bill be so amended as to allow the military authorities to locate the bridge.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. W. R. STEELE,
Delegate, House of Representatives,

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 5, 1874.

The chief clerk of the War Department has the honor to report to the House of Representatives, for the information of the Committee on Appropriations, that he has received a telegram from the Secretary of War dated West Point, New York, June 4, 1874, as follows:

"Recommend to House appropriation of $15,000 for Laramie bridge."

This, in connection with letter of the Secretary of War to the Hon. W. R. Steele, dated March 28, 1874, inclosing copies of indorsements of Generals Sherman, Sheridan, and Ord, approving the construction of the bridge proposed in House bill No. 2178, which it is understood is now with the Committee on Appropriations.

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk.

Copy of indorsements on copy of (828 A. G. O., 1874) communication dated February 26, 1874, from Hon. W. R. Steele, inclosing House bill for location and construction of a bridge over the North Platte at Fort Laramie, &c.:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE PLATTE,
Omaha, Nebraska, March 12, 1874.

Respectfully returned through headquarters Military Division of the Missouri.

The within bill for a bridge across the North Platte River having been referred to me, I have to report that since the movement of a sufficient number of troops north of that river with a view to the establishment of two new military posts or camps at the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, respectively, and of such operations against hostile Indians north of the river as may result, a bridge across the river has become necessary, for the river is at times for two and three months in a season not fordable, and the ferry which has been in accordance with General Sheridan's instructions commenced, may during a very high water be carried away, and is at best a very slow and uncertain means of crossing large bodies of troops or large supply trains, such as will have to cross the river for the maintenance of troops.

E. O. C. ORD,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

[Fourth indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI,
Chicago, March 17, 1874.

Respectfully returned to the Adjutant-General through headquarters of the Army, highly approving the construction of the bridge and believing it a want that we cannot well do without.

But I would like to have a condition attached giving the proper military authorities the privilege of locating the bridge at some other point on the river than that named in the bill should the condition of military affairs permit of a shorter line of communication to the agencies named in General Ord's indorsement.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General, Commanding.

[Fifth indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, March 20, 1874.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War, concurring with General Sheridan in opinion.

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 25, 1874.

Official copies.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to purchase Gatling guns for armament of fortifications, $70,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I make the point of order against that paragraph that there is no law authorizing an appropriation for the purchase of Gatling guns.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. An appropriation for the same purpose was made last year.

Mr. WHEELER. There is no law for this appropriation. It is not an ordinary case of an appropriation made for the purchase of arms generally or for the manufacture by the Government of its own arms. It is for the purchase from other parties of a gun by the name of the Gatling gun. There is no law for it, and the gentleman cannot find one.

Mr. CONGER. On page 546 of volume 17 of the Statutes at Large, is the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to provide Gatling guns of light caliber for the use of the Army, $60,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion the appropriation last year for this purpose would not authorize an appropriation this year. Nor would it make it in order to this appropriation bill. But the general authority of Congress to appropriate for carrying on these Departments would include for the War Department the purchase of any kind of gun or munitions of war of any kind.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. In the same way appropriations for our forts and arsenals are in order.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Chair declare the amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to read the other clause of the law in regard to the Gatling gun, and which I was about to read when interrupted.

For experiments and tests of two Gatling guns of large caliber for flank defense of fortification, $5,000, and of the systems of heavy rifled ordnance recommended for trial by the board convened under act of June 6, 1872, and, in the discretion of the Secretary, of any other systems for utilizing or improving the cast-iron guns now in the service, $50,000, in addition to any unexpended balance of appropriations made for the present fiscal year.

There was an appropriation for the improvement of heavy ordnance for our fortifications. This appropriation, I take it, is carrying out the law already upon the statute-books.

Mr. WHEELER. I say now there is no express law for the purchase of Gatling guns for fortifications. In relation to this proposition I wish to say what I said in the discussion of the Army appropriation bill. Our armories to-day are groaning under the load of accumulated guns for which we have no earthly use. We have appropriated this very winter thousands of dollars to pay for cleaning useless arms and to prevent their going to destruction.

There is no authority for the purchase of Gatling or any other guns. They are recommended by the Secretary of War for the purpose of flank defense in our fortifications. Who here supposes that a foreign enemy will land on our coasts and get so far as to assail our fortifications, as to require these Gatling guns to be used for flank defense in those fortifications? I do not believe these Gatling guns or any other guns are needed this year.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. So far as I understand the gentleman from New York his only argument is that he does not know of any enemy who is going to attack our works this particular year. If that be so, I think it would be wise to sell out the entire Army, all our machinery, all our guns; to take the heavy guns on our coast fortifications and sell them for old iron and turn the money into the Treasury. If his argument has any logical force at all that is it.

I hope no enemy does intend to land on our shores; I hope we will have no war for many years to come; but we would be a foolish nation if we did not keep up our fortifications, and would not show our usual wisdom if we did not take the best inventions in these arms to be found in the world. And now there is nothing that surpasses this particular gun for these purposes. I have in my hand a communication sent by the Secretary of War, which contains the recommendation of the Ordnance Department and of the very best engineers of the Army.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one recommendation in that report?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman can have his own time and can occupy it as he has a mind to. I do not yield to him in my time. I have the report here, and there is no question whatever about the opinion of the Ordnance Department. The examination has been very thoroughly and exhaustively made, and the ordnance memorandum, number 17, contains a full statement of the results of all the trials and experiments made. Here also is the communication from the Secretary of War with the recommendation of this gun for certain special uses and purposes, for which it altogether surpasses any other gun known in the world.

We have adopted this gun for some purposes already. But the Ordnance Department desire to put a number of them along our fortifications. They recommended a very much larger number than the committee have accepted. They recommended two hundred and twenty-one for the armament of the fortifications along the coast.

Foreign governments have adopted this weapon. Some of the European governments have bought ten times as many as we have done. And we propose to neglect this weapon at home and to neglect the armament of our own forts, while we leave those foreign governments to reap the benefits of American skill and ingenuity. I think that the appropriation reported by the committee is small enough. It is but one-fourth of the amount recommended by the Ordnance Department and the board of engineers. They recommended $292,000, and the committee reported only $70,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose simply of saying that that recommendation of the Ordnance Department includes ten of these Gatling guns for Fort Montgomery, up in my country, a fort which never had a soldier in it, where there is not one needed, and where they will not be indeed for years to come unless you send them there to take care of these Gatling guns; and the same is true of a dozen other forts.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is not in the list, however.

Mr. WHEELER. You will find it there. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$70,000," and inserting "$50,000." I do not know where these Gatling guns are made, or by whom they are made, or who is to get this $70,000 if we appropriate it; but it is very manifest that it is going somewhere, to somebody. If it brings back its equivalent, however, I do not know that it is a matter of very great consequence who gets it.

There is a great deal of force in the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] that there is no immediate pressing urgency for this class of weapons. We know as a matter of fact that experiments are constantly making in regard to them, and that men are constantly engaged in bringing these weapons to perfection. We are told that experiments are being constantly made by the Ordnance Department. I have seen a report submitted and a very pretty book it makes, and the experiments, so far as they are given, seem to demonstrate this that there is no comparison between howitzers and guns of that class and the mitrailleuses, which is the general class to which the Gatling gun belongs. Now it so happens that a young man, the son of a former Representative in this Chamber, a colleague of mine, engaged at a very early period in the manufacture of that kind of gun, and has produced a result which many persons of intelligence think to be not only equal, but superior to, the so-called Gatling gun. How that may be I know not. But one thing is very certain, that this class of guns, ever since the Franco-Prussian war, has engaged the attention of inventors. They are bringing them to a greater and greater degree of perfection. And instead of appropriating $70,000 or any other considerable sum to buy a number of one style of gun, I would rather appropriate a suitable amount to enable the Ordnance Department to try experiments with this arm. And when they shall come to something like a satisfactory result, as they have done in the case of the musket, then they should manufacture it themselves, as they manufacture the musket and other arms.

Mr. KELLOGG. That has already been done.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand from the report that is made here that there have been any comparative experiments between the Gatling gun and any other gun of the same general class to which the Gatling gun belongs.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it was my fortune, whether good or ill, to use the first Gatling guns that were brought into being, a very inferior weapon then from what it is now. I used it on boats navigating the Dismal Swamp Canal, Albemarle Sound, and other waters of North Carolina. I have watched the gun from that day to this, because it did excellent service. It is a much better gun than the mitrailleuse, a gun of the same class which did such great execution in the Franco-Prussian war. It has been now thoroughly tested and is very largely used everywhere but in its own country, because it is like a prophet; it is not without honor except in its own country. The Khedive of Egypt has two hundred of them, China has just ordered fifty, and Russia a very large number.

Here is the trouble with the argument made by my friend from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] for whom I have very great respect. I agree with him that we do not want these guns to-day nor to-morrow, and I hope we shall not want them the next day; but it will take a year to get them made, and if he can tell what necessity there may or may not be for them, even at Fort Montgomery, which I understand to be upon the Canadian line, I cannot, and when the time comes that we need them it will take a year to get up the tools and get them made. The company which makes these guns is now obliged to rely upon another armory, Colt's armory, to make them. It has not yet supplied itself with the necessary tools, and unless it can have large and assured orders it cannot supply itself with them, because the tools are very expensive and very different from those required in the manufacture of other arms.

These guns, I may say for the information of those who have not seen them, are on wheels, and turn with a crank ten barrels, and during the experiments made at Annapolis by the Navy, one of these guns shot off sixty thousand rounds and was still in a condition to be fired again. Sir, it is necessary in time of peace to prepare for war, and if you get a few of these Gatling guns, even at Fort Montgomery, I tell my friends there never will be a soldier there, at least not one of the enemy sort, for they never can get in. They are the best guns for defense, and our Government should have them to a greater or less degree. The War Department, I believe, recommend two hundred and twenty-one, but only fifty can be made for this $70,000. We shall have enough then to be thrown in any point where there is danger, and we can go on increasing the number from year to year until we have placed ourselves in a thorough position for defense; but at present the Government should have a few for immediate use in case of necessity.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I renew the amendment.

I only desire to say in addition to what has already been said that these Gatling guns have been strongly recommended by the War Department, by the Ordnance Department, and by all the military authorities that have had any occasion to examine them. They are really the finest guns of the kind that ever were made. They have the indorsement of the British government and of the ordnance officers of the British army. Louis Napoleon undertook to steal the pattern of these guns and failed. He made what was called a mitrailleuse, a very inferior gun. These guns are being purchased by all the first-class military powers of the world in much larger quantities than we are taking them. It looks like folly for us, in face of these facts, to refuse to buy these arms made by our own citizens for the defense of our coast and frontiers. We should certainly have a small supply. As has been said, we cannot make these arms instantaneously; it is a work of time. The guns are somewhat intricate in their construction. Their fabrication is not the work of a day, and if we should be suddenly involved in war it would be the most efficient arm possible in many respects for the defense of our coasts, and of bridges and other strategic points; in fine, for flank defense. I remember very well when in the Atlanta campaign almost half of our Army was strung out between Atlanta and Louisville guarding bridges; a regiment at one place, half a regiment at another, and a company at another, at fifty points, whereas one officer with a few men and with four or five of these guns can make a more effective defense of a bridge or weak point on a railroad than he could with a whole regiment with ordinary arms. The showers of shot that these guns throw, the accuracy of their aim, and the wide extent of their range are surprising and unequaled by any other arms. Trial tests have been made in both continents, and always resulted one way.

A word now, sir, about Fort Montgomery, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] sneers at. Where is Fort Montgomery? I say that it is the point where these guns, and all guns, are more needed than anywhere upon our northern frontier. It is at the head of Lake Champlain, a most dangerous point for invasion, and a strategic point of the first class in case of an inroad from Canada. It is the only point on our northern line that affords an approach by water on a line perpendicular to the border of the country. All the other lakes run along our borders. Here at Fort Montgomery Rouse's Point is a great interior water line, which if once seized by the British would enable them to send hostile vessels away down into the interior of Vermont and New York. Of all places on our frontier Rouse's Point is the most important in a strategic point of view, and there ought to be assuredly a few of these guns put there.

We need them at many other points, and can ill afford to be without them while our warlike neighbors are getting a large supply. If we are well supplied with arms we need dread no enemy; without them we may well hesitate to assert our rights at times.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. COBURN] tell this committee whether this class of guns, of which the Gatling gun is one, have been brought to such a degree of perfection that it would be wise for the Government to purchase any considerable number of them?

Mr. COBURN. I believe it would be wise for the Government to purchase them. There has been no gun made that will compare with this Gatling gun. Ordnance men of the civilized world, our own included, admit that this gun is not equaled by any other.

The committee rose informally to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion to strike out the last word of the paragraph relating to Gatling guns.

Mr. COBURN. I withdraw that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last line of the paragraph simply for the purpose of saying a few words. I do not propose to discuss the Gatling gun, nor its utility, nor the amount of the appropriation here proposed, nor whether foreign powers have selected this gun, nor whether we should have it at one fort or another.

But I desire to disenchant the minds of gentlemen who are lovers of liberty in regard to our fortifications and our danger of a war about Cuba. I want this country to understand that all this talk in the newspapers about Cuba and belligerent rights, and the action of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, is utter nonsense. That committee never had any idea of bringing in any bill recognizing the independence of Cuba or for the freedom of the colored people there. The colored people of this country might as well understand at once that neither their civil rights nor the rights of their friends in Cuba will be cared for by this Administration or by this Congress. And there is no use for men who have Cuban bonds to prowl around this House, or to get up newspaper articles, with the expectation that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or any other committee, will do anything to help them. Whether they are interested in those bonds or not (I know none of the committee are interested in them) there will be nothing done by this Congress with respect to according belligerent rights to Cuba, and they might as well stop all that thing, and our colored brethren might as well take notice and govern themselves accordingly in the next election.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire only to call attention to the general qualities of this gun, as set forth in the report of the board of engineers, for fortifications:

> The fire of canister, four hundred and forty bullets at once, has the effect of a volley, and the first discharge may completely break an assaulting column. This volley effect of the howitzer is in part made up by the continuity of fire of the Gatling, and the combination of the two, the latter filling up the intervals between the volleys, would seem to be superior to either singly, unless the number of howitzers gives a rapidity of fire approaching continuity.
> The Gatling requires fewer gunners for its service, and there are some small works where the garrisons may be quite limited on the breaking out of war necessitating economy of men in the service of the pieces. These guns on the ramparts in such works, would supply the place of a large number of soldiers. In many of our works the strength is superabundant, and either system of flank-defense will doubtless be sufficient. * * * * * *
> This board give it as their opinion that a number of Gatling guns may be effectually used on the parapet of works, as being more accurate in their fire at a distance upon reconnoitering parties, both by land and water, than field-artillery, or pieces in position, or even musketry, and they can be served with less exposure. Many of the barbette batteries that have been recommended by this board are isolated and unsupported by permanent works. Some small keeps will probably be built to protect them. The Gatling gun will be found very efficient in these keeps to clear the advanced batteries if attacked by boat or shore parties with a view to spiking the guns, and will sweep the approaches to such batteries. Further, the Gatling gun will prove very serviceable in firing into the embrasures of iron-clad ships that approach within 1,000 or 1,200 yards of a fort.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the paragraph, and upon a division there were—ayes 73, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. HAWLEY of Connecticut, were appointed.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 98, noes 48.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask members to remain here and work on this bill until half past five o'clock, and thus avoid a night session. I think if we work on the bill till that time we can finish it to-morrow.

The following was read:

To enable the Secretary of War to purchase for the United States, of the owners thereof, the lot and buildings thereon immediately west of Winder's building, on F street, Washington City, and the house and lot in the rear of and immediately adjoining the Army Medical Museum on Tenth street, Washington City, $38,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose: Provided, That the cost of said lot adjoining Winder's building shall not exceed $35,000, and the cost of said property adjoining the Army Medical Museum shall not exceed $3,500. and that payment shall not be made for either lot until the title thereto is perfect and the property free of incumbrance.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to insert after the paragraph last read, the following:

It is hereby declared that the northern part of Woodlawn cemetery, in the city of Elmira, in the State of New York, occupied by soldiers' graves, shall be deemed a national cemetery, so far only that the head-stones of said soldiers' graves shall be renewed and maintained and the graves cared for, under the provisions of law applicable to national cemeteries.

This amendment speaks for itself. It was not brought to my attention until after the Army appropriation bill had been passed by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to further amend by inserting the following:

That section 2 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," passed at the present session, shall be construed to direct the Third Auditor of the Treasury to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the sum necessary in the settlement of accounts for steamboats and other vessels pending in his office under the joint resolutions approved December 23, 1869, and March 3, 1871, and said sums so certified shall be excepted from the operation of said second section.

The Third Auditor of the Treasury says that he has been in the habit of paying these claims for vessels lost during the war out of appropriations made by the Quartermaster's Department. By the Army appropriation bill, passed a few days ago, we directed the unexpended balances of those appropriations to be covered into the Treasury. We wish to put these claims upon the same footing as other claims of a like character.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I move to insert after the amendment last adopted the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to begin the publication of the official records of the war of the rebellion, both of the Union and of the confederate armies, the sum of $15,000. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have copied for the Public Printer all reports, letters, telegrams, and general orders not heretofore copied or printed and properly arranged in chronological order.

Mr. KASSON. All he thinks necessary to publish. You do not want all published?

Mr. GUNCKEL. Yes; we want all published.

Mr. COBURN. These reports of battles, campaigns, and military operations, as well as those of the enemy called rebel archives, are now in buildings where they are liable any day to be destroyed by fire or other accident; they are liable to be abstracted or lost; and thus a most important part of the history of the country may at any time, for want of proper protection of these records, be utterly annihilated. The object of this amendment is to begin in a small way the publication of these reports and records. Everybody in the land, whether he may have been engaged on one side or the other in the late rebellion, every lover of his country, every one who delights in the preservation of its history, is interested in this matter. An appropriation of only $15,000 is asked; and it seems to me useless to reason with the House in favor of a proposition so manifestly calculated for the benefit of the entire nation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to my friend from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] to modify his amendment so as to provide for "beginning preparation for publication." The amendment in its present form proposes to begin publication; but I think we should provide now merely for the preliminary work.

Mr. COBURN. In view of the gentleman's suggestion, I will say that the Adjutant-General, who has been before the Committee on Military Affairs to-day, states that a large number of these reports are already copied and ready for publication.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I move further to amend by adding after the amendment just adopted the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to alter certain stone buildings, and make the walls and constructions around the same, to fit them for a military prison, at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, the sum of $25,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make a point of order on that amendment. A preliminary provision in regard to the building of that prison was the sending out of a commission and the making of a report. That has not been done; therefore there is no arrangement at this time for the erection of this building, and the expenditure at present is not authorized by law.

Mr. COBURN. No preliminary action of that kind is needed. The preliminary action to which the gentleman refers was in relation to the establishment of a prison at Rock Island; and with reference to that, such action was taken. But the law has authorized the removal of the prison to Fort Leavenworth, and there is nothing of that kind to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] point to any provision of law with which this amendment conflicts?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The law applying to the military prison at Rock Island has been repealed; but this is a different matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have repealed the law authorizing the building of a prison at Rock Island.

The CHAIRMAN. Does it follow from that that it is unlawful to build one at Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not understand that there is any legislation which in any shape authorizes the building of this prison.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. O, yes; there is a law authorizing the building of a prison at Fort Leavenworth.

Mr. COBURN. It became a law at this session. The act providing for commissioners to go to Rock Island was repealed; and that is a different matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is a law authorizing this expenditure, I have nothing further to say on the point of order. But I oppose the amendment on its merits. I do not believe we ought to appropriate this money this year to begin a new building.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. This is not an appropriation for a new building. It is merely a provision for taking old buildings and putting cells in them with ordinary iron-barred windows and iron doors. These buildings can be fitted up so as to accommodate sixty prisoners. This provision is therefore a saving of money.

Mr. GARFIELD. As the point of order does not lie, I wish to say a word in regard to the propriety of the amendment. There was, I think, grave doubt as to the propriety of building anywhere a military prison. But it is too late to go into that question. I will only say now, as I said earlier in the session, that to have in a country so extensive as the United States a military prison at one central point to which prisoners must be brought sometimes a distance of three or four thousand miles to serve out their term of imprisonment, and then to be transported back again, is enormously expensive and enormously unwise. I do not believe that such a measure is defensible on any ground of economy or good government.

But waiving that point, as a provision of that kind has been enacted into law, still I believe that now when we are trying to economize in every direction, we ought not to enter upon this new expenditure, for which there is no immediate and pressing necessity. We are trying to avoid or postpone wherever it is possible, appropriations for public buildings, in order to tide over the difficulties of our Treasury and to get through without a deficit; and of all buildings that have been postponed for this year, I know of none that can be deferred with so little harm to the country, with so little injury to the Government, with so little damage to any interest, as this military prison at Fort Leavenworth. I hope therefore that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is mistaken in saying that the establishment of a military prison is not a measure of economy. I hold in my hand the report of the Adjutant-General, showing that during the last ten years there has been an average expenditure of $49,000 a year for the care of military prisoners. They are scattered all over the country. All their work, all their earnings, go into the proceeds of the penitentiaries of the different States. These prisoners can be made self-sustaining. They need not cost the Government one cent. Forty-nine thousand dollars a year can be saved, and that is twice the amount which is necessary to put up one of those buildings for a military prison.

On the question of economy there is no doubt it is a great saving. The buildings are there, the ground is there, we have officers and everything ready to carry out this system. Officers of this Army, from the Secretary of War down, all recommend that it shall be done. This matter has been discussed before, and it is not a question of policy at all, but simply a question of appropriation this year. There are the buildings unoccupied, the walls sound, the roofs sound, and everything ready. It seems to me we can do nothing possible in reference to this matter by which we can save more money.

There are over two hundred military prisoners scattered throughout the United States. There is one prison in California, and it is proposed to leave the prisoners on the Pacific coast there. The prisoners at Leavenworth can be used at the work of preparation for building in making walls and all manner of work in the construction. There is a fine stone quarry at Fort Leavenworth, and they can be taken there and used in taking out stone for this building as well as in every step of the work afterward.

Mr. POTTER. Is the prison located with reference to the working of this quarry?

Mr. COBURN. Yes, sir; besides, this prison is located in the central part of all positions of the Army of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. COBURN.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 50.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. COBURN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Signal office:

Observation and report of storms: For expenses of the observation and report of storms by telegraph and signals, for the benefit of commerce and agriculture throughout the United States; for manufacture, purchase, or repair of meteorological and other necessary instruments; for telegraphing reports; for expenses of storm-signals, announcing probable approach and force of storms; for continuing the establishment and connection of stations at life-saving stations and light-houses; for instrument shelters; for hire, furniture, and expenses of offices maintained for public use in cities or ports receiving reports; for river reports; for maps and bulletins to be displayed in chambers of commerce and boards of trade rooms and for distribution; for books and stationery; and for incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, $355,325.

Mr. McCORMICK. I move to insert the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to extend the line of military telegraph from Prescott to Camp Verde and Camp Apache, in Arizona, $4,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the expenses of operating and keeping in repair the telegraph lines constructed and operated by the War Department in said Territory out of any moneys received for dispatches sent over said lines; any balance remaining after the payment of such expenses to be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt; the moneys received in any one fiscal year to be used only in payment for the expenses of that year. And a full report of the receipts and expenditures in connection with the said telegraph lines shall be made quarterly to the Secretary of War through the Chief Signal Officer. And the Chief Signal Officer shall have the charge and control of said lines of telegraph in the construction, repair, and operation of the same.

Mr. McCORMICK. By act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, the sum of $50,000 was appropriated for the construction of a military telegraph from San Diego, California, via Fort Yuma and Maricopa Wells, to Prescott and Tucson, Arizona. The line was promptly built at a cost within that sum, and the proposed line to Camp Verde and Camp Apache can, according to a statement from the War Department, be built with the balance of that appropriation and the sum of $4,000 additional asked for in this amendment. This extension will connect with the military headquarters at Prescott two important posts, and greatly facilitate military movements in the Territory. It is recommended by the War Department and by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House.

I will only add that the military authorities agree in pronouncing the construction of telegraph lines connecting the frontier posts a measure of economy to the Government and a great advantage in the conduct of Indian warfare and the protection of the people of the border. The propositions embodied in my amendment regarding the expenses and receipts of the lines and to put them under the control of the Chief Signal Officer are in accordance with the request of the War Department and the Military Committee of this House, as the chairman of the committee [Mr. COBURN] can certify. There is now no law under which the moneys required for the use of the telegraph line by citizens can be applied even to the cost of keeping up the lines.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that amendment is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBURN. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for the manufacture of the Lee breech-loading musket, for the purpose of trial among the troops in the field, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the sum of $10,000.

Mr. COBURN. I wish to say only a word on this matter. Congress is constantly every year making small appropriations for the purpose of obtaining the best quality of small-arms.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; let us have them all in.

Mr. COBURN. This gun can be fired 31 times in a minute. The experiments with all other small-arms give a very much less rapidity of firing.

The Springfield gun has 45 pieces in it; 15 of which are screws, 5 are springs, and it can be fired 17 times in a minute. The Ward-Burton has 34 pieces, of which 8 are screws, 5 are springs, and it can be fired 21 times in a minute. The Elliot gun has 35 pieces, of which 8 are screws, 3 are springs, and it can be fired 18 times in a minute. This gun, the Lee, has 14 pieces, of which 1 is a screw, 2 are springs, and it can be fired 31 times in a minute. As regards the weight of the system, the comparison is as follows: Springfield, 2 pounds 6 ounces; Ward-Burton, 2 pounds 14 ounces; Elliot, 2 pounds 14 ounces; Lee, 2 pounds 5 ounces.

No such gun as this has been submitted to the boards of the Army or to any one else for trial and inspection. The number of screws in the Springfield rifle is one more than the entire number of pieces in this gun. I recently saw the gun fired. The piece was fired, then the breech-block was taken out, was put in, and the gun fired again inside of fourteen seconds. You cannot take the breech-block out of a Springfield gun in fifteen minutes; the stock has to be taken off. There is no gun like this, so far as my experience goes; I do not profess to have great experience, but so far as my inspection of guns goes there is none like this. It is safe; the hammer brings no danger as in other guns. We are spending money constantly for knowledge as to guns, large and small, and I believe we can spend nothing for that purpose more advantageously than by appropriating $10,000 for supplying the troops with a few of these guns by way of experiment. That is what we did two or three years ago, and the result of that is the Springfield musket which is now being made for the Army. But while it is being manufactured we are not making them very largely, because everybody anticipates great improvements in small-arms; and wisely enough, if we look at the rapid progress of the last twelve years. In no branch of mechanics has there been greater progress. This is but a small sum. It is for the benefit of no man; no one can speculate out of this sum. It might take about that much to make perhaps five hundred or one thousand; I do not know precisely how many; but no man can make money out of it. This is simply a proposition to furnish the public with knowledge as to the best qualities of small-arms. No one can tell but that there may be a better one invented before this is adopted; but we are doing this kind of thing constantly, and I can see no possibility of taking an intelligent step in the direction of getting a good small-arm unless we test them in this way. The inventor of arms must look to his own or foreign governments for patronage, and when a man of genius lays his work at our feet we should give him proper recognition and take advantage of his skill and ability. We should not turn our backs upon those who furnish us the ready means of national defense.

WASHINGTON, June, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I hope you will pardon the liberty I take of calling your attention to the following figures taken from the last report on small-arms, showing the number of pieces peculiar to each system; also what proportion are screws and springs, which according to the report should be as few as possible.

I also append the figures from a report made by the Ordnance Department on an arm recently presented by me, hoping the matter will be of sufficient interest to call the attention of your committee to that part of the act of 1872 which prevents the use or trial in the field of any improvement in the military arm of the service. The three arms selected are those recommended by the report, one for adoption, the other two for trial in the field.

Report of Ordnance Department on small-arms.

	Pieces.	Screws.	Springs.	Shots per minute.	Weight.
	No.	No.	No.	No.	Lbs. oz.
Springfield	45	15	5	17	2 6
Ward-Burton magazine	34	8	5	21	2 14
Elliot	35	8	3	18	2 14
Lee	14	1	2	31	2 5

It will be noticed that with less than one-third the number of pieces in the Lee arm the rapidity of fire is increased more than one-third over the Springfield. It also has other advantages which I would be glad to show the committee at any time.

Respectfully,

JAMES LEE.

Hon. JOHN COBURN.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have adopted after great deliberation what is considered the best gun in the world. If we give any money to experiment with we ought to give it for anybody's gun that is sent to be tested. We ought to give power to the Ordnance Department to examine new guns and report upon them. But to pick out one man's gun and say that $10,000 shall be expended in trying to use it, to see if it is not the one we should adopt, is a favoritism which the law should not give. It is giving an advantage to a particular gun which Congress ought not to give.

Mr. COBURN. We have done it many times.

Mr. GARFIELD. We ought not to have done it.

The question being taken on Mr. COBURN's amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Support of Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum at Washington, District of Columbia: Pay of medical officers and attendants; medicines, medical supplies, and rations; clothing; rent of hospital buildings; fuel and lights; repairs and transportation, $50,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I offer the following amendment, which I hope the committee will accept:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of surveying the lands of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000.

Mr. SPEER. Is not that amendment liable to the point of order that there is no law authorizing this appropriation?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This was overlooked by the Committee on Appropriations, and ought to go in.

Mr. GARFIELD. If my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER,] who has had charge of the portion of the bill relating to surveys, thinks that this should go in, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on the point of order?

Mr. SPEER. I do.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This is no more subject to the point of order than any other appropriation for surveys. This is part of the public lands of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Has not the title of the United States been extinguished?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This is an Indian reservation, and is subject to the same laws as the Indian reservations for the survey of which we have already appropriated to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand if the land belongs to the Indians why the United States should survey them, unless there be some law requiring it. Does the gentleman say that there is any law requiring the United States to survey the lands belonging to the Indians?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. We have appropriated this morning for surveys of lands on Indian reservations precisely like this under the recommendation of the Department of the Interior. I call the attention of the Chairman to these appropriations on page 18 of this bill.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. We have obligated ourselves to do this by treaty stipulation.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is a treaty stipulation that is the law of the land.

Mr. SPEER. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand the point of order to be that this is not germane to the particular paragraph now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, which has been withdrawn, was that the appropriation was not authorized by existing law.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this particular paragraph.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. It is an independent paragraph.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The committee are now engaged upon a paragraph under the head of "War Department," relating to "miscellaneous objects" in that Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. The amendment comes in under the head of miscellaneous objects.

Mr. GARFIELD. But these are miscellaneous objects of the War Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. It is an independent proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not germane to this part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts is well taken. But the Chair thinks that this appropriation is authorized by law on the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. STARKWEATHER.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I want to say that there is a lawsuit pending in which the United States are interested, and according to treaty stipulations this should go in. But it was overlooked in the committee. If it is not in order here, it ought to go in in the proper place. I think it is in order here as an independent proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order at the close of this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other claims of colored soldiers and sailors: Salaries of agents and clerks; rent of office; fuel and lights, stationery, and so forth; office furniture and repairs; mileage and transportation of officers and agents; telegraphing and postage, $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$50,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$85,000."

A communication from the Secretary of War shows that that much money will be required for this purpose.

Mr. SPEER. Let the gentleman have the letter read.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a telegram, in which he says the experience of this year has shown that $50,000 will not be a sufficient amount.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completing the medical and surgical history of the war, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in the act of June 8, 1872, is hereby continued and rendered available.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have an amendment to offer to that paragraph, which I am instructed by the committee to offer. It is to add after the word "available" at the end of that paragraph the words:

And the Surgeon-General is hereby authorized to continue on duty in his office the acting assistant surgeons now employed on said history during the next fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following amendment.

Strike out the paragraph, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For completing and publishing for distribution the Medical and Surgical History of the War, $64,000.

I do not understand that the paragraph as it stands includes the publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War.

Mr. KELLOGG. This is just what they ask.

Mr. FORT. I do not understand that the amendment which has been adopted, offered by the committee, includes the publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War for distribution. It provides for the completion of the publication; that is, for the third volume; but as I understand the matter two volumes have already been published and are now in type or stereotyped, and I am told that $64,000 will pay all the expenses necessary to complete and publish them for distribution.

Mr. GARFIELD. The provision in the bill was put in for that very purpose, and is in accordance with the request of the Surgeon-General. There is money enough on hand to complete the publication, but under the law covering appropriations into the Treasury on the 1st of next month, that money will be covered into the Treasury and rendered unavailable unless it be reappropriated by Congress and made available as is done by this provision of the bill.

Mr. FORT. I will modify my motion so as simply to strike out the first line. I only wish to say this, that amid the horrors of war there has been gleaned much valuable scientific intelligence which will tend to the amelioration of pain and the saving of life hereafter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that while we appropriate, and appropriate properly, large sums of money for the support of the institutions at West Point and Annapolis, and for the purchase of guns and powder for the destruction of life, it is possibly our duty to make some appropriation which shall tend to the saving of life and the relief of pain. The medical staff is a part of the Army, and yet I understand no appropriation has ever been made and no establishment has ever been organized for the purpose of teaching medical science with a view of having it serve its proper place in our armies during war. This vast amount of knowledge that has been gleaned during the war has been collected and ought to be diffused, and I know of no better way in which $64,000 could be expended for the purpose of fitting young men to become surgeons in case of war than by publishing this information, and it seems to me proper that this work should be completed for distribution.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Can the gentleman from Illinois tell us how much it would cost to publish the additional volumes of the report?

Mr. FORT. I understand that it will cost about $64,000 to republish the work.

Mr. MERRIAM. How many copies?

Mr. FORT. I am told about seven thousand volumes. It matters not what it costs; I say that we cannot spend money better than to furnish this information to those who are to be surgeons in time of war. We spend no money for the purpose of saving life; all our interest seems to be to destroy life. I say this is a humane measure and should be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the amendment as modified may be read.

The Clerk read the amendment as modified, which was to amend the provision in the bill so as to read:

For completing and publishing for distribution the Medical and Surgical History of the War, $64,000; and the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in the act of June 8, 1872, is hereby continued and rendered available, &c.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I understand that there have been five thousand copies published of the two volumes already prepared, but the plates are now worn out, and they cannot be reprinted without making new plates.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Who says the plates are worn out?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. The Surgeon-General.

Mr. FORT. They can be renewed in a few minutes.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Did the Surgeon-General say so to you?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. He did; there must be new plates to reprint the volumes of this work already prepared. It is very necessary in order to complete the work that this money, which otherwise would be covered into the Treasury, should be reappropriated. When the work is completed is the time, the Surgeon-General says, to order a republication of the whole work.

Mr. MERRIAM. Can the gentleman tell when this work will be completed?

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, pursuant to the order of the House, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 876) to amend the law relating to patents, trademarks, and copyrights.

Mr. STARKWEATHER and Mr. RANDALL moved that the House adjourn.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to give notice that on to-morrow at twelve o'clock, if I should succeed in obtaining the floor, I will ask permission to submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the currency bill. I ask that the report of the committee of conference be printed for the use of the House, and also printed in the RECORD.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment after "that," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall be hereafter known as "the national-bank act."

SEC. 2. That section 31 of "the national-bank act" be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits in all respects as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said acts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the proviso in the first section of the act approved July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," prohibiting the banks hereafter organized a circulation over $500,000; and the proviso in the third section of said act limiting the circulation of banks authorized to issue notes redeemable in gold coin to $1,000,000; and section 6 of said act, relating to the redistribution of twenty-five millions of circulating notes, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; that every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by "the national-bank act."

SEC. 4. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of such circulation; which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve, as provided in section 2 of this act; and when the circulating notes of any such associations, assorted or unassorted, shall be presented for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; and whenever such redemptions for any association shall amount to the sum of $500, such association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And all notes of national banks worn, defaced, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation shall, when received by any assistant treasurer or at any designated depository of the United States, be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption as provided herein. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed shall be forwarded to the respective associations by which they were issued; but if any of such notes are worn, mutilated, defaced, or rendered otherwise unfit for use, they shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed and replaced as now provided by law: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the charges for transportation, and the costs for assorting such notes; and the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the cost of engraving such plates as shall be ordered by each association respectively; and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer: And provided further, That so much of section 32 of said national-bank act requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this section, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes, which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

SEC. 6. That the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, cause the charter numbers of the association to be printed upon all national-bank notes which may be hereafter issued by him.

SEC. 7. That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, which shall be retired and reduced in the following manner only, to wit: within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall, from time to time, be issued to national banking associations under this act, in excess of the highest outstanding volume thereof at any time prior to such issue, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to three-eighths of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in reduction of the maximum amount of $382,000,000 fixed by this section; and such reduction shall continue until the maximum amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000; and the United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of the act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund. And the interest thereon computed at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be added annually to said sinking fund. But if the surplus revenue be not sufficient for this purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

SEC. 8. That on and after the 1st day or January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue in exchange for said notes an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the act amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 1871, which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of such bonds may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

And the Senate agree to the same.

HORACE MAYNARD,
C. B. FARWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

O. P. MORTON,
JOHN SHERMAN,
A. S. MERRIMON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I took the floor this morning and kept the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] from making a word of personal explanation. I ask the House, as a matter of fairness, to permit him to make it now.

Mr. RANDALL. He can do it better to-morrow morning. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of John Maley, of Anne Arundel County Maryland, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ALBRIGHT: The petition of John W. Forney and others, editors and publishers, that the rate of prepaid postage on newspapers be fixed at one cent per pound and on other periodicals at two cents per pound, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, the petition of workingmen of Columbia, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to take action upon the currency and tariff questions, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 100 citizens of Carbon County, Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty on iron and steel and for free banking, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 150 citizens of Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. AVERILL: The petition of the grange organization of Alexandria, Douglas County, Minnesota, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of T. A. Middleton, of Washington County, Tennessee, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CESSNA: The petition of the Farmers' National Bank of Greensburgh, Pennsylvania, for change of name and location, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CROUNSE: The petition of the grange organization of Sarpey County, Nebraska, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut: The petition of practical printers of the city of Washington, that no rule be adopted fixing an arbitrary scale of prices for printers' work in the Government Printing Office, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, the petition of Fayette Hungerford, for relief, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HYDE: The petition of citizens of Brunswick, Chariton County, Missouri, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Mrs. Anne McHugh, mother of Joseph McHugh, deceased, formerly of the Sixty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ORR: The petition of citizens of Perry Township, Plymouth County, Iowa, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. PARKER, of Missouri: The petition of citizens of Nodaway County, Missouri, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of Samuel Cole, of Middlesex County, Virginia, for compensation as light-keeper at Stingray Point, Chesapeake Bay, from January 1, to April, 1861, to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of Enoch E. Rollins, of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, for compensation for the schooner Sarah Ann, seized in the Rappahannock River in 1862, and converted to the use of the United States, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: The petition of workingmen in mass meeting assembled at Columbia, Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty taken off in 1872; for a resumption of specie payments by the United States Government January 1, 1882, by the banks January 1, 1884, and for the free issue of currency by national banks based on United States bonds, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. STORM: The memorial of workingmen of Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duties taken off in 1872, and recommending certain action upon the currency question, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The petition of workingmen of Columbia, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. STRAWBRIDGE: The petition of 116 workmen of the Danville Iron-Works, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILSON of Iowa: The petition of the grange organization at Illinois Grove, Iowa, for the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of A. Howells and 240 others, of Massillon, Ohio, for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duty on iron, steel, and other commodities, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of J. P. Burton and 84 others, of Massillon, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 381 workingmen of Alliance, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 93 citizens of the seventeenth congressional district of Ohio, praying Congress to take steps to secure the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of H. J. Clark and 214 other citizens of Poland, Mahoning County, Ohio, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry into the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 13, 1874.

The Senate met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one omission in the Journal which will be corrected. The last motion made was by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] to postpone the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill and proceed to the consideration of bills reported by the Military Committee. That motion was agreed to. The Secretary understood it to be only an asking of unanimous consent, which never goes on the record, but it was a motion made by the Senator from Rhode Island, and carried. This correction will be made.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3673) making an additional appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. WEST, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask, subject to the disposition of morning business, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific Railroad Companies, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that, subject to the transaction of morning business, there shall be an understanding that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SARGENT. Is that the House bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. The House bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Without amendment?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is amended by the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not object. I think it ought to pass.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is in reference to the 5 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TIPTON. I understood there was an objection on the other side, or I was ready to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska object?

Mr. TIPTON. I do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we give notice that when resolutions are through we shall move to take up the bill.

TERRITORIAL LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented two copies of the general laws, private acts, joint resolutions, and memorials passed at the tenth session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Colorado; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WASHBURN presented a petition of a large number of prominent citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, asking that an arrangement may be made for the improvement of the harbor at that place, and the maintenance of a fog-signal at the entrance of Buzzard's Bay; which was ordered to lie on the table, the river and harbor bill having been reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a memorial of bankers, manufacturers, and importers, citizens of Newark, New Jersey, protesting against a tax on sales of stocks, coin, bonds, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Louis Sterne, of Boston, Massachusetts, asking compensation for his losses and services in connection with the collection of the internal revenue and the legislation in relation thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a memorial of citizens of Durham, Orange County, North Carolina, protesting against the passage of a law permitting growers of leaf-tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial from banks, bankers, and other business men of the city of Syracuse, New York, protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill which imposes a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of bankers, merchants, and business men of the city of New York protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill, which imposes a tax of $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Rochester, Monroe County, New York, protesting against the passage of a law permitting growers of leaf-tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That Emily Agnel have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

INSANE CONVICTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while imprisoned, to report it back with amendments, and I ask that it may be passed now. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section provides that upon the application of the Attorney-General the Secretary of the Interior shall transfer to the insane asylum in the District of Columbia all persons who have been or shall be convicted of any offense in any court of the United States, and imprisoned in any State prison or penitentiary of any State or Territory, and who, during the term of their imprisonment, have or shall become and be insane, in case satisfactory arrangements for their care and custody shall not be made by the Attorney-General under other provisions of the act.

Section 2 provides that in all cases where any person convicted in a court of the United States shall, while imprisoned under such conviction in any State prison or penitentiary, become and be insane, the Attorney-General shall have power in his discretion to contract with any State insane or lunatic asylum within the State in which such convict is imprisoned for his care and custody while remaining so insane; and in all cases where such convicts shall have heretofore been, or shall hereafter be, transferred to a State asylum for insane convicts in accordance with the laws of such State, the Attorney-General is directed to compensate the asylum or the proper authorities controlling it for the care and custody of such insane convicts, until their removal or discharge, in such amounts as he shall deem just and reasonable.

By the third section whenever such insane convict shall be restored to sanity, after he or she shall have been transferred under the provisions of the act, he or she shall be returned to the prison or penitentiary from which the transfer was made, provided the term of imprisonment shall not have expired. The questions of sanity in all cases arising under the act are to be determined in accordance with the rules and regulations of existing laws, State or national, on that subject, applicable to the prison, penitentiary, or asylum where such convict shall be confined.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out in section 1, commencing in line 10, the words "in case satisfactory arrangements for their care and custody shall not be made by said Attorney-General under other provisions of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 4, after the word "insane," to insert:

And there shall not be accommodation for such insane person at the insane asylum of the District of Columbia, or if for other reasons the Attorney-General is of opinion that such insane person should be placed at a State insane asylum rather than at said District asylum, then.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section 2 the following words:

But no contract shall be made or compensation paid for the care of such insane persons beyond their respective terms of imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAME AND LOCATION OF A BANK.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 930) to authorize the Farmers' National Bank of Greensburgh, Pennsylvania, to change its location and name, to report the same back without amendment and recommend its passage. It is a very brief bill, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Whenever the stockholders of the Farmers' National Bank of Greensburgh, in the county of Westmoreland, Pennsylvania, at a meeting called for that purpose, shall, by a unanimous vote, determine to remove the bank to the city of Pittsburgh, in the county of Allegheny, the president and the cashier are to execute a certificate, under the corporate seal of the bank, specifying such determination, and cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and thereupon such change of location shall become effectual and valid.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS COMPANY.

Mr. SCOTT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment and agree to the bill of the House with sundry amendments, as follows:

In line 10, section 1, strike out the words "said loans" and insert in lieu thereof "money loaned thereon."

In line 12, section 1, after "keep," insert the words "the buildings upon."

In line 13, section 1, strike out "its" and insert "their."

In section 3, line 4, strike out the words "Comptroller of the Currency" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

Strike out all of section 5 after "years" in line 15.

Section 7, line 2, strike out the word "wind" and insert "close."

Section 7, line 3, after "men" insert the words "not connected with the previous management of the institution and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Section 7, line 6, strike out the word "wind" and insert "close."

Section 7, line 25, after "company" insert "for the purposes of this act."

Section 7, line 29, strike out "winding" and insert "closing."

Section 7, line 37, after "pro rata" insert "distribution."

Add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 8. That from and after the passage of this act, and until the 1st day of July, 1875, all the deposits made in said trust company shall be held by the trustees of said company as special deposits, and any investments made of said deposits shall be made and held for the use and benefit of said depositors only; and it shall be the duty of said trustees on or before the 1st day of July, 1875, to make a full and complete statement of all the assets and liabilities of said company and lay the same before the Secretary of the Treasury, and if said Secretary and the trustees shall at that time, after investigating the condition of said company, believe the same to be solvent, then the trustees and said Secretary shall issue an order declaring that thereafter all deposits shall be general; but said order shall in no wise affect the special deposits unless said depositors shall in writing consent that said special deposits shall become general deposits. But if the Secretary and trustees of said company shall on the 1st day of July, 1875, after the examination aforesaid, doubt the propriety of making the deposits thereafter general, then the deposits made shall still be special until the 1st day of July, 1876, or until the said Secretary and trustees deem it prudent to make said deposits general.

And the House agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
JOHN SCOTT,
T. F. BAYARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
C. B. FARWELL,
M. J. DURHAM,
C. L. MERRIAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 780) requiring the United States marshals and clerks of the United States circuit and district courts who have received fees and emoluments in excess of their legal compensation, to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States, moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. WEST, from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2342) to provide for the construction of the Fort Saint Philip Canal in the State of Louisiana, and its maintenance as a national public highway, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. By direction of the same committee I am instructed to report an amendment to the river and harbor bill, and I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 657) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of Anderson & White, have instructed me to report an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE] desired to present the views of the minority. I do not see him in his place.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were, by a resolution of the Senate of May 4, instructed to make certain inquiries as to the Washington Market Company, to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and to submit a report in writing on the subject, and I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (S. No. 937) repealing a portion of the "act making appropriations to supply deficiencies," approved March 3, 1873, and disapproving and annulling a portion of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia of the date of August 23, 1871; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 46) for the construction of a custom-house and bonded warehouse at Portland, Oregon, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 912) to annex certain land to reservation No. 2 occupied by the Department of Agriculture, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 886) to provide for the election of Congressmen at large for the State of Alabama, to report the same back without amendment; and as I presume there is no objection to it, I ask to have the bill put on its passage.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator will not ask that.

Mr. MORTON. It will take but a moment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I know that; but I gave notice that I would call up a bill, and I object.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot.

Mr. MORTON. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3501) relative to the compensation of Representatives in Congress, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I think it can be passed in a moment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I must object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3539) to admit free of duty merchandise sunk for two years, and afterward recovered, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3670) to amend section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for the abatement or repayment of taxes on distilled spirits in bond destroyed by casualty," reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. No. 657) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of Anderson & White, which has been reported unanimously from the Committee on Claims. It is only a small bill and it will not take a minute.

Mr. WRIGHT. I must object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

A division was called for.

Mr. CONKLING. If this bill is reported to-day one objection carries it over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware that the bill was reported to-day. If so, one objection, then, is sufficient. The Chair supposed it was upon the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not make any objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Who objects?

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that I made the objection not because I have any opposition to the bill, but I have given notice that I shall call up a bill that is of great public importance and interest immediately after the close of the morning business, and I am exceedingly anxious to get it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. This bill will not take two minutes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported a bill this morning which I should like to have passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 912) to annex certain land to reservation No. 2, occupied by the Department of Agriculture, reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As that was reported this morning I object.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3170) for the relief of John W. Marsh, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 938) for the relief of Thomas G. Kingsley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 939) extending the time for the completion of a railroad in the State of Louisiana, from the Texas State line to a point on the Mississippi River opposite Vicksburgh, Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific Railroad Companies.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to require payment of the Pacific Railroad Companies of all sums of money due the United States for the 5 per cent. of the net earnings provided by section 6 of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and in case either of those railroad companies shall neglect or refuse to pay the same within a reasonable time after demand therefor made upon its treasurer, the Secretary of the Treasury is to certify that fact to the Attorney-General, who shall thereupon institute the necessary suits and proceedings to collect the same in the proper circuit courts of the United States, and prosecute the same, with all convenient dispatch, to a final determination.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 4, after the words "require payment of," to strike out the following words:

The Pacific Railroad Companies of all sums of money due the United States for the 5 per cent. of the net earnings provided by section 6 of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862,

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Railroad companies, their successors and assigns, or the successors or assigns of any or either of said companies, of all sums of money due the United States for the 5 per cent. of the net earnings provided for by the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, or by any other act or acts in relation to the companies therein named, or any other such company or companies.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 23, to strike out the words "a reasonable time" and insert "sixty days."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 27, after the word "collect," to insert the words "and otherwise obtain redress in respect of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. Those are all the amendments reported by the committee. I suggest as a mere verbal amendment that the word "the" ought to be inserted before the words "railroad companies," in line 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. In line 13, after the word "due" I move to insert the words "or to become due," so as to read "of all sums of money due or to become due the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

That the said Union Pacific Railroad Company be, and is hereby, required to operate its whole line, including its bridge and approaches across the Missouri River, without transfer at said bridge, as one connected continuous line of railway; and if it shall fail after sixty days after the passage of this act to operate its road as hereby required, it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to institute and prosecute proceedings by mandamus in the circuit court for the ninth judicial circuit of the United States to compel a compliance with the requirements of this section and the act to which it is amendatory on the part of the said Union Pacific Railroad Company. And the said court may obtain jurisdiction in said case by service on any agent of the defendant found in the district or circuit in which said suit may be brought, and such service shall be by the court held to be good and sufficient: Provided, That if said decision is that said bridge should not be operated as a continuous part of said Union Pacific Railroad, the Attorney-General shall remove said cause by proper process to the Supreme Court of the United States, and if the decision should be that said bridge should be operated as a part of said road, the Union Pacific Railroad——

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to interrupt the reading of this amendment to inquire of my friend from Iowa whether his purpose is to defeat the pending bill by moving this new one as part of it?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire whether the Senator's purpose is to defeat the pending bill requiring the railroads to pay their interest, by moving this bill in reference to another subject upon it?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; the very reverse of that is my purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to say to the Senator, he may rely upon it that this other bill, the foundation of this amendment, will not be adopted to-day if he proposes to introduce a discussion of the question of the terminus of the Pacific Railroad, whether it shall be in his State or in the State of the Senator near him, [Mr. TIPTON.]

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senate will allow me one moment, I propose to introduce no such discussion. This does not affect the question of terminus in any sense, and is not intended to do so.

Mr. CONKLING. What has it to do with this other bill? Why not offer it as a separate bill and not mix it up with this interest question?

Mr. ALLISON. It is as important as the question of interest, and is perfectly germane to the bill before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not deny, if the Senator will pardon me, that it is as important, and if he will affirm that it is a hundred-fold more important, I shall not deny that. My suggestion is that the one subject has nothing to do with the other. The Judiciary Committee has carefully prepared a bill requiring the railway companies to render to the Government the interest which they owe, 5 per cent. Thereupon my friend from Iowa proceeds to move a bill which we never heard of in the Judiciary Committee, which he says is equally important or more so, which relates to a wholly different matter, which is an independent subject that the committee have never examined, and which I am told by another Senator is a bill which has once been postponed this session. Now, if the Senator wants to hang a millstone around the neck of this little bill requiring the railroad companies to pay their interest, this is a very good way to do it. If, on the contrary, he wants to legislate about this important and independent subject, I suggest to him to let his bill stand on its own feet, take it up on its own merits, and not attempt to put it on another entirely foreign to it and to which in no sense, however vague, it can be germane.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will listen to me one moment I will explain it. On the 3d of March, 1873——

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to inquire whether the reading of the amendment has been finished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been.

Mr. CONKLING. A good deal of it has been read.

Mr. ALLISON. I can explain it in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rest of the amendment had better be read before the discussion proceeds.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Provided, That if said decision is that said bridge should not be operated as a continuous part of said Union Pacific Railroad, the Attorney-General shall remove said cause, by proper process, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and if the decision should be that said bridge should be operated as a part of said road, the Union Pacific Railroad may remove the same, by proper process, to said Supreme Court; and, to the end that a speedy determination may be had thereon, the said circuit and Supreme Courts may advance said cause on their calendars respectively.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to occupy a moment's time. On the 3d of March, 1873, Congress passed an act requiring the Union Pacific Railway Company to operate their road as required by law, the law requiring them to operate it as a continuous line. A proceeding in mandamus was begun in the circuit court for the ninth judicial circuit requiring them to do this. This railway company go into that court and object to the jurisdiction. The Attorney-General declines to interfere with reference to this subject-matter; and the only object of this additional section is to require the Attorney-General to institute proceedings in the United States court in order to test the validity of the law requiring the Union Pacific Railway to operate its road as a continuous line. While it has a different purpose from that proposed in this bill, it is a purpose that affects every portion of this country as much as the proposition involved in this bill affects the people of this country. It decides nothing if nothing has been decided heretofore. It turns this question over to the courts of the United States, requiring them to compel the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its line as a continuous line; and that is all it does. It does not affect the question of terminus; it does not propose to affect the question of terminus; it only proposes to compel the company to operate the line which they have built, and to the building of which the United States have contributed a large proportion, as a continuous line. It is certainly important that this should be done, and I see no reason why it should not be decided here and now.

Mr. TIPTON. The Union Pacific Railroad has never for one moment, or in one single instance, refused to operate its line from the initial point first established to its terminus at Ogden, in connection with the Central Pacific; but there has been a dispute between two rival towns, one at the terminus of the Union Pacific and the other on the shores of the State of Iowa. The State of Iowa two years ago by legislation positively prohibited any one of her railroads terminating at the Missouri River from daring to cross the Missouri River on the bridge established there and make a connection with the Union Pacific.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I appeal to the Senater from Nebraska to let us first test the question preliminarily whether the Senate will consider this question in connection with our bill?

Mr. TIPTON. I am willing to yield the floor that that point may be tested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senate decide to do that, then of course the Senator must be heard and so must everybody else. Therefore I hope we may have the question put as to whether this amendment is to be adopted. We cannot put it in any other way, because I cannot move to lay it on the table unless the Senator from Iowa will allow me to do so. If he will consent to a motion to lay it on the table with a view merely to see whether the Senate will consider the two questions together, I will make that motion. Will the Senator assent to that without carrying the bill with it, to test the sense of the Senate as to whether they will receive his amendment for consideration?

Mr. ALLISON. It is quite easy to test the sense of the Senate on the amendment by voting for it or against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the difficulty about that is that it might be carried or rejected when it ought to be debated. However, I can risk it if the Senator from Nebraska will allow the Chair to put the quession on the adoption of the amendment, so that we may know whether Senators are willing to ride this bill with that which is a separate matter or not.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that perhaps he had better in the first instance address his appeal to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Iowa used to be a reasonable man. He was the last time I knew anything about him, and I presume he is still. I submit to him, that he is doing a most unreasonable thing in asking the Senate to consider this long, unprinted, independent proposition of his, totally foreign to the bill before us, or else to lose and fail to pass a simple measure requiring all railway companies whatever, covered by the bill, to pay to the Government 5 per cent. interest which is due and to become due. I think my friend from Iowa, if he will consider one moment, will agree with me that he would be more reasonable were he to move his proposition as an independent bill or if he were to move it as an amendment to two or three other bills now pending in the Senate. There is a bill pending reported by the Judiciary Committee, a House bill, and also a Senate bill on the same subject, relating, among other things, to the obligation of the Union Pacific Railroad Company to operate its whole line, trunk and branches, as one continuous line. There is a sort of first cousinship between that subject and this; but to bring in this written and never yet printed proposition about the bridge across the Missouri River and its approaches, in short the war between the houses of York and Lancaster, the fight between Nebraska and Iowa as to which shall be honored by the terminus or butt-end of the Union Pacific Railway, which side of the river it shall start and stop, is I think a very unreasonable suggestion. And as my friend shakes his head, I wish to make my statement absolutely literal by saying that although his proposition relates to the theme I have stated and to nothing else, he is unwarranted in saying as he did say that the mode in which it relates to it is to direct what the Pacific Railroad shall do and what the Attorney-General shall do, and what suits shall be instituted in court, how they shall be removed to other courts, and how they shall finally culminate, if they are successful, in making the bridge over the Missouri River and its approaches a part of the continuous line of the Union Pacific Railroad, so that the State of Iowa, in addition to all the honors with which it is crowded, will have the terminus of that road within its domain. That is what the bill now offered as an amendment means, and that is all there is about it; and if the Senator presses it here he will simply defeat the other bill.

Mr. ALLISON. As the Senator from New York has been kind enough to compliment me on my amiability, I may, if I can have his attention, withdraw the amendment which I have offered and propose another which certainly will not be obnoxious to the objection which he thinks is contained in this amendment—a proposition which simply authorizes the Union Pacific Railroad Company to appear and defend any suits that may be brought against it, in the ninth judicial circuit, when process is served upon any of its agents. Now it is impossible to find this Union Pacific Railroad Company, although it has a continuous line of nearly twelve hundred miles of railway. When you commence your suit in any of the circuit courts in Iowa or Nebraska, the Union Pacific Railroad Company is located in Boston or somewhere else down in the eastern portion of the country. They make all sorts of objections to the processes of the court and to the service of those processes. If the Senator from New York and other gentlemen who desire the immediate passage of this bill will consent that I shall put upon this bill a provision requiring them to appear——

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend pardon me?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. If he will make a minor modification in his amendment, for one I shall have no objection. If he will change the amendment so as to allow the Pacific Railroad Company to appear whenever it may be necessary to defend the claim of the United States for the 5 per cent. interest which this bill is intended to bring into the Treasury, I see no objection to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is already in the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator wants an amendment authorizing the railway company or somebody else to go into court in reference to some matter that has nothing in the world to do with this, then I should be compelled to say, as I said of his other amendment, that he is introducing here what the doctors call a foreign subject. It has nothing to do with the bill before us.

I will say to the Senator since he suggested the last amendment that there are four bills pending in the Senate to either of which that amendment would be germane. I agree with the Senator entirely about it not only as to the Union Pacific Railroad but as to everybody else that additional facilities for serving process ought to be given. There are two bills here from the Judiciary Committee reported yesterday and to-day on that general subject. The Senator can move this as an amendment to either of those. There are also the two bills which I referred to relating to the duty of all these railway companies to operate and co-operate with each other as continuous lines. It would be entirely germane to them. But why select this bill which concerns one simple definite interest of the Government, and attempt to tack on to it this other, not in the one form or the other, which as I conceive has nothing to do with it, and which ought not to be put upon the bill, it being a matter of contest? As to the bill itself there can be no objection, it being a mere assertion of the right and interest of the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. The only reason why I press it on this bill is that I think this bill is likely to pass, because it ought to pass. There may be a great number of other bills to which this amendment would be germane, but which are not likely to pass at this session, or perhaps at the next session. Therefore, when I find a bill before the Senate affecting the Union Pacific Railway Company, it occurs to me that it is germane and proper to put on an amendment at least requiring them to appear in some court outside of the State of Massachusetts when suit is brought against them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to make this suggestion to every friend of the Treasury of the United States, that the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee is simply to require the proper steps to be taken to have these railroad companies pay into the Treasury the 5 per cent. of their earnings which the statute that created them expressly declares they shall pay in annually; and that is all. It is, as the Senator from Iowa ought to know, who has some eye to the interests of the Treasury, a simple and just proposition which I believe will carry a unanimous vote in this body, that these railway companies, now that they are getting an income, shall comply with that regulation or show the reason why. I say that it is not just, it is not fair, it is not parliamentary in any upright and fair sense to undertake to ride this bill with any other proposition whatever, no matter how just it may be in itself. But the Senator from Iowa has nearly succeeded in killing this bill of the Judiciary Committee, for it is almost one o'clock, when the unfinished business comes up. Now I appeal to the opponents of this amendment, without regard to whether they believe in its merits or not, and to those who are in favor of the bill, to just let us take the vote and try the sense of the Senate; and there will be ways enough, if the Senate is disposed to consider this now, to reach it for debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I not only desire to be fair, but I desire to be parliamentary. Being a new member of this body, of course I may occasionally without intent offer amendments that are not quite parliamentary. I had no such intent in offering this amendment. Now, if the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York, who have charge of the bills that are coming up from the Judiciary Committee, say that this amendment is germane to some other bill, and that I shall not meet the same objection when the other bills are considered, I will withdraw the amendment and offer it to some one of the bills proposed.

Mr. STEWART. I am glad that course is taken; but I hope the Senator will offer it, for he certainly aims to remedy a very great inconvenience. I hope he will not forget that promise.

Mr. ALLISON. I assure the Senator I shall not forget it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CASE OF SENATOR MITCHELL.

Mr. MORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report back certain affidavits and a petition from citizens of Oregon preferring charges against Hon. JOHN H. MITCHELL, Senator from that State, and to ask to be discharged from their further consideration. I take pleasure in saying that the committee were unanimous in the opinion that there was nothing in these papers requiring or justifying an investigation.

The committee was discharged.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BOGY. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 3573) making additions to the fifteenth section of the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That bill I think will lead to some discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer an amendment to the bill just called up, and ask to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. BOGY. I hope we shall go on with this bill; it will take but a moment. It is a matter of great importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to postpone the pending order, which is the bills of the Committee on Military Affairs, and proceed with the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. BOGY. It will take but a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was not agreed to.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to give notice that immediately after the disposition of the post-office appropriation bill I shall move to take up the bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give notice that I shall oppose it.

LAKE NICARAGUA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish the Senate with the report and maps of the survey to ascertain a practicable route for an interoceanic ship-canal via the Lake of Nicaragua.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much will it cost for these maps?

Mr. SARGENT. It will not cost anything to furnish them, because they are ready for transmission. I want to see the document. The question of printing is not involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator call for the original maps?

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the copies which are now ready for transmission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand, then, that the maps have been copied in some way.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand they are ready for transmission.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is right to go to the expense of having these maps lithographed from the original drawings, it is——

Mr. SARGENT. That is a question to be determined subsequently by the Senate when it determines whether to print them or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But how are we to get the maps unless they are already copied?

Mr. SARGENT. My information is that they are now ready to be transmitted to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not hear that remark of the Senator before.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAINTER'S REPORT ON METALLURGY.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of Howard Painter, commissioner to the Vienna exposition, upon metallurgy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are a good many other reports. I think that resolution had better lie over so as to have them called for at once.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state that the information in this report upon metallurgy is of extreme value to us on the Pacific coast.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt that.

Mr. SARGENT. And the report has been made to the Secretary of State and is ready to be sent in, and after it comes in we can refer it to the Committee on Printing to decide whether it shall be printed or not. If the Senator has objection to any expense being incurred on account of it we can arrest it at that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the point at all. If we call for any of these reports we ought to call for all of them, because the reports on the other subjects of industry, agriculture, &c., are interesting to my constituents. I think the resolution, therefore, ought to call for all the reports, in order that we may get them all.

Mr. SARGENT. On that consideration I will consent that it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid over.

ALVIS SMITH.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the first bill on the Calendar reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. No. 345) for the relief of Alvis Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to pay to Alvis Smith, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of cavalry, from the 10th of October, 1863, to the 8th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PRATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted amendments to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRAGUE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3572) to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 2539) to admit free of duty merchandise sunk for two years and afterward recovered; which was ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BOWLIN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 344.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 344) for the relief of William Bowlin was considered as in the Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to pay to William Bowlin, late of Company I, second Arkansas Cavalry, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry from the 10th of October, 1863, to the 8th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M. KIMBALL.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 455.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of War is directed by the bill to cause to be paid to William M. Kimball the full pay and emoluments of a lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Eleventh Minnesota Volunteers, from the 10th of October, 1862, to the 8th of May, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN SHELTON.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 436.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of Lieutenant John Shelton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Paymaster-General to pay to John Shelton, late first lieutenant Company E, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, the full pay and allowance of a first lieutenant of infantry, from the 1st of September, 1863, to the 16th of August, 1865, less the pay he received as a private of the company.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN DOLD.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 764.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 764) for the relief of John Dold was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Dold $1,525.83 in lieu of check No. A, 7531 on the United States depositary, dated the 26th of February, 1872, payable to the order of John Dold, and signed by A. J. McGonigle, acting quartermaster United States Army; which check, it is claimed, has been lost, and was never received by Dold; but before the payment John Dold is to execute a bond of indemnity to the United States, with sufficient sureties, against the claim of the payee in the draft.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, which was to add the following words to it:

Or the claim of any person in possession of or claiming the same, and also to fully indemnify the United States against all loss and damage in the premises.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. PILKENTON.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1587.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of War is directed by the bill to place the name of William H. Pilkenton on the rolls as second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, as of the date of June 30, 1864; and the proper accounting and pay officers are directed to allow and pay him the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant from that date until the date of his discharge, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER BURTCH.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to take up House bill No. 1313.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1313) for the relief of Alexander Burtch.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with amendments, in lines 8, 9, and 10 to strike out the words "and the said Alexander Burtch shall be allowed and paid the amount remaining due and accrued up to the time of his absence aforesaid," and to insert the words "and that he may be honorably discharged;" also in line 12 to insert the words "pay or" before "bounty," and after the word "bounty" to strike out the words "subsequently granted by the United States."

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will withdraw those amendments. The amount of money due to Burtch is very small; I think less than sixty dollars. He served during the entire war, and did not leave his regiment until some four months after the 9th of April, 1865.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the bill be amended so as to strike out "pay and bounty," and give him pay up to the time of his leave of absence.

Mr. ALLISON. Then you had better reject the first amendment and agree to the second.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the bill be read as it stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Adjutant-General of the Army is hereby authorized and directed to change the record of desertion against Alexander Burtch, late veteran soldier of Company H, First Indiana Heavy Artillery, formerly Twenty-first Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and substitute therefor "absent from September 25, 1865." And the said Alexander Burtch shall be allowed and paid the amount remaining due and accrued up to the time of his absence aforesaid, but shall not be entitled to any bounty subsequently granted by the United States.

Mr. LOGAN and Mr. ALLISON. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments reported by the committee will be considered as disagreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EPHRAIM P. SHOWALTER.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1768.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that Ephraim P. Showalter was drafted into the service of the United States on the 26th of September, 1864, for the period of one year, and on the 18th of November, 1864, was mustered into the service of the United States, in Company D, Thirtieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; that on or about the 2d of December, 1864, Showalter furnished, and caused to be mustered into the service of the United States, a substitute for two years, paying therefor the sum of $1,000; but notwithstanding he furnished the substitute, he was held to service until the 23d of June, 1865. The bill, therefore, proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Ephraim P. Showalter the sum of $500, which is to be in full for his claim for the substitute.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties, and agreed to other amendments of the Senate with amendments, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, of New York, Mr. LIONEL A. SHELDON, of Louisiana, and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, of New York, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 876) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyrights; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

MOIETIES UNDER CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties, which has just been returned from the House of Representatives with a request for a committee of conference. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment disagreed to by the House, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know to which of our amendments there are other amendments, and to which there is a disagreement in some form.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the action of the House of Representatives, as follows:

Resolved, That the House concur in the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 12, 15, 16, 17, 23, 28, 30, 40, 41, 42, and 43.

Mr. CONKLING. That does not indicate anything. If there is anything there which points to the subject of the amendments or to the sections, I should like to hear it.

The CHIEF CLERK. Only those amendments that are amended are referred to.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I think the bill had better lie over for the present until we can look into it. The Senator from Ohio can call it up again in a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

Subsequently the message of the House of Representatives was laid before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and grant the conference asked by the House of Representatives. I beg leave to say in making this motion that as I am very much occupied on another bill—the tariff bill—I desire to be excused from serving upon the committee of conference of this body.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. SCOTT, HOWE, and BAYARD were appointed.

JOSEPH C. BRECKINRIDGE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2698.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2698) for the relief of Joseph C. Breckinridge for services in the Army of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Paymaster-General to pay to Joseph C. Breckinridge the full pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of cavalry from the 30th of August, 1861, to the 5th of June, 1862, being the period during which he served as aid-de-camp on the staff of General William Nelson and General George H. Thomas prior to his muster into the United States service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA INDIAN WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2416.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2416) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the States of Oregon and California in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1872 and 1873.

The Secretary of War is required by the bill to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expenses claimed to be necessarily incurred by the States of Oregon and California, or the citizens thereof, for arms, ammunition, supplies, transportation, and services of the volunteer forces in the suppression of Indian hostilities in those States in the years 1872 and 1873, and report the same to Congress at the next session, the names of persons who claim to be entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and sums upon which such report may be based.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF GEORGE SCHWARTZ.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 718.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 718) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Schwartz, deceased, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to amend the record of George Schwartz, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, by causing the charge of desertion to be removed. It further provides that the legal representatives of George Schwartz shall be treated in respect to claims for pay, allowances, bounty, and pension the same as if his death had been proved to have taken place in the line of his duty and in the military service of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. VON ENTRESS FUERSTENECK.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 324.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $1,455.20, to be paid to M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second lieutenant of Company A of the Sixty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers, to cover a period of service from August 30, 1863, to December 21, 1864, inclusive, at which time he was commissioned, and actually performed duty as a second lieutenant, but was not mustered in.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES W. BIESE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 323.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 323) for the relief of Charles W. Biese, late second lieutenant of the Eighty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By the bill the sum of $814 is appropriated, to be paid to Charles W. Biese, late second lieutenant of the Eighty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, to cover a period of service from August 2, 1863, to March 12, 1864, inclusive, during which time he actually performed duty and was regularly commissioned as second lieutenant of the Eighty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, but was not mustered in.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this amount does not exceed the difference of pay between a second lieutenant and sergeant during the time specified, and which difference of pay he shall be only entitled to receive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES W. BERRY.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1219.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1219) for the relief of Charles W. Berry, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Adjutant-General of the Army to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Charles W. Berry, late private Company E, Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, in view of his wounds while in the service; and that he shall be allowed and paid the back-pay, bounty, and additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, due him in the same manner and to the same extent as if the charge of desertion had never been made and his application therefor had been filed before the 30th of January, 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR ABSALOM BAIRD.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to take up House bill No. 2131.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2131) to authorize a promotion in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army of the United States.

The preamble recites a vacancy of lieutenant-colonel in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army originated on the 13th of June, 1867, to which Major Absalom Baird was entitled to be promoted under the laws then in existence, but from which he was excluded by reason of an appointment in the department previously made; and that an act of Congress approved June 8, 1872, which it was believed would rectify this wrong, has failed to secure to Major Baird his just rights. The bill therefore authorizes the President to nominate and promote Absalom Baird to be lieutenant-colonel and assistant inspector-general, to date from June 13, 1867; but no officer in the department is by this act to be reduced from his present grade, nor any pay or allowance to be made to any officer under it except from the date of his confirmation.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to lay that bill on the table, as a similar bill has passed both Houses. We passed one in the Senate, and the House passed another, and they have since passed the Senate bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL E. RANKIN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up House bill No. 1773.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin. It directs the Paymaster-General to pay to Samuel E. Rankin, late a first lieutenant of the Ninth Tennessee Cavalry Regiment, the full pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of cavalry, from the 5th of October, 1865, to February 13, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN R. POLK.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 476.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of John R. Polk. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to John R. Polk, a citizen of the State of Indiana, who was commissioned, mustered, and served as major of the Eighth Regiment of Indiana Infantry Volunteers, the pay and allowances of a major of infantry, from the 22d of May, 1864, to the 26th of November, 1864, deducting therefrom whatever pay and allowances he may have received from the Government as major during that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATTHIAS WHITEHEAD.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to take up House bill No. 1774.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead.

The Adjutant-General of the Army is directed by the bill to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Matthias Whitehead, late a private of Company G, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry; and it further provides he shall be allowed and paid the back pay and bounty due him in the same manner and to the same extent as if the charge of desertion had never been made.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment in lines 8 and 9 to strike out the words "and bounty due him in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said charge of desertion had never been made," and to insert: "due him to the 31st day of October, 1864, when he was ordered to return to duty, but he shall not be entitled to any bounty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY CLOTHING TO NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to take up House bill No. 2359.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2359) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to reserve from sale ten thousand suits of old and disused Army uniform clothing, now in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and to transfer the same to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. WEST. I see that this bill calls for a distribution of ten thousand suits of clothing, and if that clothing is not on hand, or is of a character that is not in use, then the Secretary of War is to provide other clothing for the purpose. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs how many patients there are receiving the bounty of the United States in this National Home for Disabled Veteran Soldiers?

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot give the number. If the bill is likely to lead to discussion let it lie over for the present, until we can dispose of other bills to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CONKLING in the chair.) The bill will be laid aside for the present.

ROBERT F. WINSLOW.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2223.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Robert F. Winslow was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Robert F. Winslow, of Illinois, $813.82, for services rendered in raising, drilling, and equipping troops mustered into the United States service during the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTIONS IN STAFF DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 321.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 321) authorizing appointments and promotions in the Medical and Ordnance Departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOGAN. I offer from the Committee on Military Affairs a substitute for the bill. I will state that this substitute is made up of part of a bill passed by the House of Representatives after conference between some of the officers of the Army and the chairman of the Military Committee of the House, and some members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate agreed that it should be offered as a substitute, providing for three corps or more of the staff departments.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert the following:

SEC. 1. That the Inspector-General's Department shall consist of one colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, and two majors, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of officers of said grades; and the Secretary of War may, in addition, detail officers of the line, not to exceed four, to act as assistant inspectors-general: Provided, That officers of the line detailed as acting inspectors-general shall have all the allowances of cavalry officers of their respective grades; and no new appointment shall be made in the Inspector-General's Department until the number of inspectors-general is reduced to five.

SEC. 2. That the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general; and the said Judge-Advocate-General shall receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army. In the corps of judge-advocates no appointment shall be made as vacancies occur until the number shall be reduced to four, which shall thereafter be the permanent number of the officers of that corps.

SEC. 3. That hereafter there shall be three assistant commissaries-general of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel, instead of the two now allowed by law of said grade in the Subsistence Department; that the number of commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a captain of cavalry, is hereby reduced to twelve, and no appointment to fill a vacancy in said grade shall be made until the number thereof shall be reduced to twelve; and the number thereafter shall remain fixed at twelve.

SEC. 4. That the Medical Department of the Army shall hereafter consist of one Surgeon-General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general; one assistant surgeon-general, and one chief medical purveyor, each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel; and two assistant medical purveyors, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonels, who shall give the same bonds which are or may be required of assistant paymasters-general of like grade, and shall, when not acting as purveyors, be assignable to duty as surgeons by the President; fifty surgeons, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of majors; one hundred and fifty assistant surgeons, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenants of cavalry for the first five years' service, and with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captains of cavalry after five years' service; and four medical store-keepers, with the same compensation as is now provided by law; and all the original vacancies in the grade of assistant surgeon shall be filled by selection by competitive examination; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to appoint from the enlisted men of the Army, or cause to be enlisted, as many hospital stewards as the service may require, to be permanently attached to the Medical Department, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe. And the number of contract surgeons shall be limited to seventy-five on or before the 1st day of January, in the year 1875; and thereafter no more than that number shall be employed.

SEC. 5. That the Ordnance Department shall consist of one Chief of Ordnance, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general; three colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, ten majors, twenty captains, sixteen first lieutenants; and all vacancies which may hereafter exist in the grade of first lieutenant in said Department shall be filled by transfer from the line of the Army: Provided, That no appointment or promotion in said Department shall hereafter be made until the officer or person so appointed or promoted shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board of ordnance officers senior to himself.

SEC. 6. That no officer now in service shall be reduced in rank or mustered out by reason of any provision of law herein made reducing the number of officers in any department or corps of the staff.

SEC. 7. That as vacancies shall occur in any of the grades of the Ordnance and Medical Departments, no appointments shall be made to fill the same until the numbers in such grade shall be reduced to the numbers which are fixed for permanent appointments by the provisions of this act; and thereafter the number of permanent officers in said grades shall continue to conform to said reduced numbers; and all other grades in said Ordnance and Medical Departments than those authorized by the provisions of this act shall cease to exist as soon as the same shall become vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise, and no appointment or promotion shall hereafter be made to fill any vacancy which may occur therein.

SEC. 8. That so much of section 6 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1869, as applies to the Ordnance, Subsistence, and Medical Departments of the Army be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That this section repealing said section shall not apply to any of the grades of the Medical or Ordnance Departments which are omitted or abolished by the provisions of this act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That bill evidently contemplates changes in the organization of certain departments of the Army. I should be glad if the Senator would state its effects so far as it changes the service.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no changes; it does not muster out any one, but it fixes the status of the different corps here mentioned; it fixes the number that they shall have, and that the vacancies which occur are not to be filled till they are reduced to a certain number. They go on until they are reduced to that number, but then no appointments after that shall be made in the corps.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it confined to those three departments?

Mr. LOGAN. It is confined to the Ordnance, Medical, Commissary, and Inspector-General's Corps. It includes also the Bureau of Military Justice. It does not affect any one in office now, but contemplates vacancies.

Mr. WEST. This bill contemplating certain changes in the staff departments of the Army and introducing changes that have not hitherto been presented for the consideration of the Senate by the printing of certain bills, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether it increases the number of officers in either one of the staff departments, and if it does so increase, what particular officers of the staff department are increased. For instance, I ask him whether it increases the number of officers in the Commissary Department.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer that it increases in the Commissary Department the office of lieutenant-colonel. There are two lieutenant-colonels now; this provides for three. There are sixteen captains now, and this provides for twelve. It cuts off four captains and adds a lieutenant-colonel.

Mr. WEST. What is the case in the other departments?

Mr. LOGAN. In the other departments there are no changes made except to reduce the number. It cuts off the vacancies that now exist in several instances, and reduces the corps to a certain number which shall not be increased hereafter. It is a reduction in all the corps when vacancies shall occur, and increases none, except that it makes the change in the Commissary Department which I have mentioned. There is no increase over what is allowed by law, but a reduction of what is now allowed by law. It opens promotions, but promotions are not to be opened in a corps to go beyond the number fixed in the bill. Where vacancies exist beyond that number the places are abolished.

In further answer to the question of the Senator from Louisiana, I wish to state that there is one increase of rank, and it is this: the three purveyors in the Medical Department have the same rank, the rank of lieutenant-colonel. The chief purveyor having that rank is the junior of the other two. This makes a change, so as to give the chief purveyor the rank of colonel, to correspond with the rank in other departments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill reorganizing the staff corps of the Army."

Mr. SARGENT. I move to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 321 was passed, but I will not ask for action now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

RETIREMENT OF MILITARY OFFICERS.

Mr. LOGAN. The next is the bill (S. No. 319) making retirement in the Army and Marine Corps after a certain age obligatory; but there may be some question about it, and I will not call it up until after I get through with the bills which will not be objected to.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think there will be any debate on the bill if the Senator will accept an amendment making the age sixty-five instead of sixty-two.

Mr. LOGAN. I could not accept any amendment, but I am willing that the Senate should decide the question. I will not call up the bill now, and I will not when the Senator is out.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

CLOTHING TO ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 53.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to issue to the enlisted men of Company I, Second Regiment United States Cavalry; Company H, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry; and Company E, Third Regiment United States Cavalry, clothing in lieu of, and equal in amount to, that lost by them or rendered unfit for further use by their efforts to extinguish and prevent the spread of the fire which occurred at Fort Sanders, Wyoming Territory, on the 23d day of April, 1873, as shown and recommended in the report of the board of survey convened under special order No. 59, headquarters Fort Sanders, Wyoming Territory, of date of April 24, 1873.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed

GEOLOGICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. LOGAN. The next bill (S. No. 686) for the aid of geological and other surveys in the several States, was reported against unanimously, but was placed on the Calendar. I hope the bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WEST. On behalf of the Senator who has evidently had that matter carried to the Calendar with a view of calling the attention of the Senate to it, I think it would be better to pass it over. I cannot tell who the Senator was; but evidently when the adverse report was made, some Senator requested that it be put on the Calendar. I think, out of courtesy to that Senator, whoever he is, the bill ought to be passed by. I make the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CONKLING in the chair.) The Chair will put the question. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

KERRY SULLIVAN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 491.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 491) for the relief of Kerry Sullivan, of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Kerry Sullivan, late private in Company G of the Fourteenth Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers, commissioned a second lieutenant in that regiment, of the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry, from the 5th of May, 1865, to the 8th of July, 1865, the date of his discharge, as if he had been mustered as a second lieutenant on the 5th of May, 1865, first deducting whatever sum may have been paid him as a private soldier during the period for which he is hereby allowed pay and emoluments as a second lieutenant of infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIS N. ARNOLD.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 574.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 574) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to Willis N. Arnold, of Henderson County, Tennessee, $10,000, being the amount collected by the military authorities for his benefit and paid by them into the United States Treasury.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to the bill to strike out "ten thousand dollars" and insert "six thousand dollars."

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Having reported the bill, I can state the facts in less time than it will take to read the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield, or insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. INGALLS. I will hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WADLEIGH. This claimant was a loyal citizen of Tennessee. He was sending his cotton to Memphis. The cotton was taken for the purpose of making fortifications at Henderson Station, in Tennessee, that place being attacked by a band of rebel guerrillas. The cotton was destroyed by the attack. Then under a military commission there was levied upon the disloyal citizens of that county and paid by them the amount of the value of that property and other property destroyed in that raid, and the Government received from those citizens, as appears conclusively from the evidence, the full amount of this claim and has it in the Treasury. This bill merely provides that he shall receive from the United States Treasury what the Treasury has received from his cotton under that finding of the military commission and the consequent payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT BRADY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 757.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 757) to donate a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady to school district No. 1, of Sault Sainte Marie, and State of Michigan, for school purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to inquire from the Senator from Illinois what this bill takes off the reservation.

Mr. LOGAN. A very small portion according to the evidence before us.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is less than two acres—1.26 acres. It is simply for school purposes, and is confined to that; I think there can be no objection to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUFFERERS BY THE WRECK OF THE TORRENT.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 704.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 704) for the relief of the officers and men of the United States Army who were sufferers by the wreck of the bark Torrent was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to each officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private who was on board the transport Torrent at the time that vessel was wrecked in Cook's Inlet, Alaska, on the 15th of July, 1868, a sum sufficient to reimburse him for losses actually sustained by the wreck of the vessel; these sums to be determined by the Secretary of War.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to strike out the word "officer" in line 3, so as to read "there shall be paid to each non-commissioned officer, musician, and private," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the non-commissioned officers and men of the United States Army who were sufferers by the wreck of the bark Torrent."

JOHN N. NEWMAN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 622.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to place the name of John N. Newman on the rolls as first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, from August 15, 1863, to February 2, 1864; and the proper accounting and pay officers of the Government to allow and pay to him the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of cavalry during that time, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. DIVINE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2092.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying $738.83 to John W. Divine, as assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, from the 8th of May, 1863, to the 1st of October, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA VAUGHN AND LOUISA JACKMAN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 502.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 502) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs propose to strike out the preamble, and amend the bill so as to make it read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Mrs. Martha Vaughn $2,500, and to the legal representatives of Mrs. Louisa Jackman $2,500, for patriotic services, hazards, and losses incurred by said Martha Vaughn and Louisa Jackman in conveying information of great value to the Union officers in the State of Kentucky in March, 1863.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I would inquire of the chairman whether this case was not pending before the Committee on Claims in the Senate, and whether it was not reported upon adversely? I have no distinct recollection upon the subject, but the names seem to be familiar. It seems to me in the Forty-second Congress this claim was pending before the Committee on Claims and reported adversely.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot give the information because I know nothing about it. The only information I have in reference to the case is that it has been before the Military Committee some time. Last session it was before the Military Committee, and probably the session before. The bill passed the House at that time and was amended in the Senate committee. I know nothing about it beyond that except the testimony in the papers. It may have been before the Committee on Claims, but I have no knowledge on that point.

Mr. PRATT. I see the chairman of the Committee on Claims in his seat at this time, and I inquire of him whether the claim of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, for services performed in conveying valuable information to Union officers was not at one time before the Committee on Claims?

Mr. SCOTT. There were several claims of this character before the Committee on Claims during the last Congress, during which time the Senator from Indiana and myself were both members of the committee, although I was not at that time its chairman. I cannot recall these names; but if the Senator from Illinois will consent to let the bill pass over for a moment I will send for a list of claims reported by our committee in the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest that the report be read, and it may recall the facts to the Senator's mind if it is the same case.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. LOGAN on the 6th of May:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 502) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

This is a claim for services rendered by these parties in March, 1863, in giving information to the Union forces of the strength and condition of the rebel army then and there opposing them, and is fully set forth in the following extract from the petition of claimants, which is made a part of this report:

"The petition of Mrs. Martha J. Vaughn, of the State of Indiana, and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, of the State of Kentucky, respectfully represents that they were, before and during the greater part of the war, residents, one of Lincoln County and the other of Garrard County, in the State of Kentucky; that in the month of March, 1863, during the invasion of the State by the rebel army under the command of General Pegram, when the Union forces had retreated across the Kentucky River, destroying ferries and bridges, and abandoning and destroying much national and State property, they made their way through the rebel lines to the commanders of the Union forces across the Kentucky River with complete information of the rebel strength, the quantity of artillery and small-arms they had, the disposition of their forces, and their plans; that at the time they communicated the said information, a still further retreat was about to be made involving the destruction of the bridge across the Kentucky River, costing $80,000, and the sacrifice to the flames and the enemy of large and valuable military supplies; that the result of their work and information was to prevent this great loss by an immediate attack being ordered, which in twenty-four hours ended in the complete defeat and dispersion of Pegram's whole force, the capture of all their artillery, large numbers of horses and mules that had been pressed, and over five hundred prisoners, together with the unexpected loss to the rebels of Kentucky as a source of supplies for their armies."

The statements herein made are fully confirmed by the affidavits of the officers to whom this information was given, as well as by affidavits of loyal citizens of Kentucky who were cognizant of the facts. It is also further shown by the evidence that in consequence of these acts these claimants and their families were compelled to leave that section of the country and seek homes and safety elsewhere.

In consideration of the value of the service rendered and the losses suffered by the claimants, the committee believe said claimants are entitled to and should receive a reasonable compensation therefor. The passage of the bill with the amendments as reported is recommended.

Mr. SCOTT. I can now state to the Senator from Indiana that I have the docket of the Committee on Claims of the Forty-second Congress before me, and I do not find either of these names as claimants on that docket. I have no recollection personally of this case having been before the committee.

Mr. LOGAN. I have an idea that it has not been, but only from the fact that it has been before the Military Committee ever since I have been on it, I think; I know it has ever since I have been chairman.

Mr. PRATT. Before the vote is taken on this bill I hope the Senator from Illinois will state on what principle the sum of $2,500 is allowed to each of these ladies, or rather to the survivor and to the children of the deceased. Did these ladies incur any pecuniary sacrifices, and if so to what extent, in consequence of leaving their homes and coming within the Union lines?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know how much they had, but they lost all they had. The principle on which this allowance is recommended is the same principle that during war times information of that kind is purchased, and persons are paid very large sums of money for giving information of that character. We deemed these people more entitled to pay because it was a voluntary act on their part, showing their feeling in connection with the services of the Union Army. They took great hazard of life and health; and if any gentleman will read the testimony I think he will not consider the amount allowed at all exorbitant. They traveled day and night across rivers and did acts that are certainly seldom done by ladies, and acts of a heroic character such as are seldom done by men. This is not compensation merely for their losses, but compensation such as would have been given by the Army if they had been employed as secret-service agents, which is a common thing in the service. They would have been paid a much larger amount than the committee propose to allow, if paid in that way. I know that from my own experience.

Mr. PRATT. I ask the Senator whether the passage of a bill of this character will not open the door to a very large number of claims of a similar kind? Will not the Government be called upon to respond?

Mr. LOGAN. I think not. I do not believe there is a case—certainly none has ever come to my knowledge while I have been in Congress since the war—of the character of this one. There may be some other case, but if so I have never heard of it. The evidence shows that the conduct of these two ladies was that which I never heard of in other persons during the war, especially females. There have been instances, I am told, where persons have been paid very large sums out of the secret-service fund, but not by Congress. I do not think there will be many cases like this. The precedent certainly cannot run very far.

Mr. SCOTT. I am always very averse to seem even to oppose a claim which has been investigated by a committee and reported, and I only rise to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that cases of this character do deserve very serious consideration from the danger of the precedent that will be set. The principal motive for granting this compensation is not that these ladies have suffered in their own property and that compensation is to be made for that loss, but principally because of their patriotic feelings leading them to encounter inconvenience and run some personal hazard in communicating this information.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that there have been numerous cases before the Committee on Claims of volunteer nurses who went into the Army from patriotic motives, rendered very great and very valuable services in the hospital and in traveling with the camps to take care of the wounded soldiers, and the committee have never felt justified in setting the precedent that where services were rendered from motives of that character we would undertake to compensate them in money. I do not now remember the number of cases, but the Senator from Indiana will bear me witness that quite a number of cases of that character have been considered; and if I am not mistaken we have before this Congress—it may not be in the Senate—a very large claim made by a lady, not simply for patriotic services in that direction, but for having actually communicated the intelligence which led to the formation of the plan of the campaign which resulted in General Sherman's march to the sea; so that if we are to go into the question of compensating patriotic motives and patriotic services of this character, it should be fully considered before we embark on it.

I do not object to this bill, as I say, for I always feel that committees who have examined these cases and reported upon them are entitled to the confidence of the Senate unless something in the case itself reveals something particularly objectionable. I do not see that in this at present, and I only desire, as cases of a cognate character may come before the Committee on Claims and the Military Committee, that we should not be setting a precedent which will bring us in conflict hereafter.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as the examination of this case by the Military Committee is concerned, they felt the force of all that has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but this was considered as a very extraordinary case, and it is a very extraordinary case. I have witnessed the fact that a great many applications have been made here, as stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but none of them is like to this in any particular whatever. This is a very different character of case from those. I do not know that I would take any more risk or trouble than any other man, probably not as much as many; but I would not perform the service these two ladies performed, considering the weather to which they were exposed and the manner in which they had to perform it and the risk they took, for $25,000, if you offered me the money to-night. This allowance is not for the loss of property, not for patriotic motives, but upon the ground that it was a character of service that the Government paid for at that time. The principle on which this bill is reported is that the Government paid for that character of service, and paid extraordinary prices, and these ladies should not be excluded.

Mr. SCOTT. Did they make application to the commanding general at the time?

Mr. LOGAN. For payment?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember that they did. This is the first I knew of the case: When I became chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs one of the ladies, since dead, came to me and told me her story. I said the precedent would be a bad one, but if she told the story as it was, and could bring proof to satisfy the committee, I did not think there would be any committee who would refuse to pay. They asked $5,000 each. The committee in the House gave them $5,000 apiece. We changed it to $2,500, believing that probably a bill of that amount would pass. We did not think a bill of a higher amount would. I honestly believe that the amount allowed by the House was a reasonable allowance, although of course I do not put it upon the ground that the particular services they performed would have been worth that; but it was for the information they communicated. You could not have employed any one else to perform the duties they did and go as they did through the enemy's lines for $10,000. I am satisfied of that, and I hope the bill will pass, for I think it is a very meritorious one.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read, "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Jackman and the legal representatives of Mrs. Martha Vaughn."

ROBERT TILLSON & CO.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2699.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2699) for the relief of Robert Tillson & Co., of Quincy, Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The claim of Robert Tillson & Co., of Quincy, Illinois, for loss and damage growing out of the failure of the Government of the United States to keep and perform the contract or contracts as to time and manner of payment, under which certain horse equipments and infantry accouterments were manufactured, between the months of September, 1862, and July, 1864, for the Government, is by the bill referred to the Court of Claims, with authority to investigate the same, and to ascertain, determine, and adjudge the amount equitably due the firm, if any, for such loss and damage.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. P. INGRAM AND J. K. ASKINS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2788.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of Henry P. Ingram and John K. Askins, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to H. P. Ingram, captain Sixty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and to John K. Askins, second lieutenant Sixty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers, the salaries of their respective offices from the 15th of January, 1862, to the 10th of April, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES M. ROBERTSON.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of the House bill No. 2697.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2697) to create an additional major of artillery, and to promote Captain James M. Robertson, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to add an additional major to the Second Regiment of Artillery, to be filled by the nomination and appointment of Captain James M. Robertson by the President of the United States; and Robertson is to take rank next after the junior major of artillery. The additional major thus added to the Second Regiment of Artillery is not hereafter to be filled by any other officer, and the office is to expire whenever, by any casualty, the number of majors in each regiment of artillery shall be reduced to three. The pay of Captain Robertson as major is to commence from the date of his confirmation by the Senate on the nomination by the President.

Mr. WEST. I see by the Army Register that there are three majors in that regiment already. Will this make four?

Mr. LOGAN. It will make another one.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator be kind enough to give to the Senate some reason for making a major when the Army is being now conducted with three majors to each regiment? Why create four for this particular regiment? What is the reason the committee recommend it?

Mr. LOGAN. I will state the reason. Major Robertson has been in the Army a great many years. He came into the Army from civil life. He was a brigadier-general and a gallant man during the war. When it came to the promotions in his regiment for majors he was jumped by other majors. They were promoted over his head, but he was senior major. His meritorious conduct and services are shown by every officer. If I had time I would read the letters, and I think there are twenty of them, from leading officers of the Army recommending this bill on account of his gallant conduct and on account of the manner in which he has been treated by promotions being made over him. That is the reason for it, and none other.

Mr. WEST. I do not know anything about the circumstances of the treatment of this officer unjustly. Some such instances occur in the course of the military service; but it seems to me that Congress is about to do a most unwarrantable act. Undoubtedly there were officers all through the line who deserved a better fate than they received at the hands of Congress or of the country, but here is an isolated proposition to make four majors in a regiment of artillery, simply because an officer has served his country faithfully and has not exactly received the deserts which the committee seem to think ought to be his. We could do that all along. When we are reducing the rank and file of the Army constantly, to be making majors out of men is out of the question, and I am surprised that the committee should report any such thing, and I shall be a great deal more surprised if the Senate agree to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. WEST. On the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAYTON. This is a case, as I understand it, where an officer was illegally jumped. Two officers were placed before him, he being in the line of promotion. I hold that promotion in the Army is as much a right the officer possesses as the right he possesses to draw his pay; and it is no more than natural that every officer should guard that right with all the power he can bring to bear. This officer was prevented from having that right of promotion applied to him by the arbitrary jumping of two other officers over him.

Mr. WEST. Whom by? Who did it?

Mr. CLAYTON. The War Department did it, I suppose.

Mr. WEST. Nobody can commission an officer but the President of the United States. Has he done a wrong?

Mr. CLAYTON. The papers in this case show that it was done. I will not say who did the wrong. It was done under Johnson's administration. The wrong was done; this officer was jumped. There was no reason given, and can be no reason given, why he was jumped. He won his commission in the Mexican war, and served all through the rebellion. He held commands far above his rank in the Army in the military service throughout the rebellion. No reason can be or has been given why this act should have been done. This bill is merely for the purpose of doing justice to that gallant officer, and I hope the Senate will stand by the Committee on Military Affairs, who have examined fully into this matter, and are unanimously, I believe, satisfied that the bill is just and right.

Mr. WEST. I do not propose to say anything in regard to the legislation that is offered here to-day by this Committee on Military Affairs, but I call the Senate's attention now to the fact that they have legislation here to-day for the increase of promotions. They have provided for an increase of the staff departments largely, and you are involving the country and you are involving the Government of the United States in a very largely increased expense when the tendency is and ought to be entirely in the other direction. And here is a case beyond precedent and without precedent in the history of the Army of the United States. I challenge contradiction of my assertion when I say it is without a precedent in the history of the Army of the United States to make an additional major of artillery in time of peace. It never was heard of before. All the directions of Congress are toward reduction, and not toward increase.

I very much regret that this officer has had injustice done him; but I ask the chairman of the Military Committee and I ask the Senator who last spoke if they do not know that injustice pervades all through the Army in regard to such things. And now are we to take out one man and particularly appoint him a major? In the name of conscience are not three majors enough in time of peace to conduct any regiment of artillery, and I ask what is the use of a major of artillery anyhow? When does artillery ever act together under the command of a major? Here is a proposition to make another. Search the bills as offered here to the Senate; watch what you are doing. You are certainly about to do something that has never had a warrant or precedent before in the history of the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to discuss this proposition, but I do not see any necessity for excitement over it. The Senator from Louisiana asks for a precedent. I admit that there are many times in the Army where good men are overslaughed improperly, and this certainly is a case that warrants interference by Congress if a case ever did warrant it. I can cite the Senator to several precedents, if it is necessary, where things of this kind have been done. I can show him that in the Inspector-General's Department, in the Quartermaster's Department, and in the different departments of the Army the very same thing has been done time and again by acts of Congress.

Mr. WEST. Done for what? To requite a man for injustice or to increase the efficiency of the service? Which?

Mr. LOGAN. I will state the fact, and the Senator may construe it as he chooses, that at the last session of Congress we made a colonel in the Inspector-General's Department, Colonel Davis, upon the same principle that this bill is founded. Colonel Davis during the war was overslaughed in the manner in which this man was. He was regarded as an efficient officer and entitled to his promotion, but the place was filled, and the last Congress made him colonel in the Inspector-General's office on the very principle that this bill makes this man a major, because he was entitled to the rank, and he was—I will not say cheated out of it, but unlawfully deprived of it. This man, Robertson, has been unlawfully deprived of the position of major in the artillery, although I do not remember the number of years, but I think it is over twenty probably that he has served faithfully in the Army. He happened unfortunately to be from civil life, and when it came to the promotions two majors were promoted over his head who were his juniors and men who had not performed an equal service to this man. On account of his meritorious services and on account of the fact that he was deprived of his right illegally the House has passed the bill. It came here and we considered it in the committee and for sometime the committee, were very much disposed not to grant the request; but the evidence was so overwhelming of the right of this man and of the bad faith toward him and of his good service to the country, that we concluded to give him that rank to which he was entitled by law. I know, as the Senator says, it is not common to have four majors of artillery in a regiment. I know there is no particular necessity for four.

Mr. WEST. Is there any particular necessity for three?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that there is any necessity for any of them; but so far as that is concerned it is not a question of discussion. It is certainly just to this man that he should have this rank, and on that ground we base it, none other. I am willing now to let the Senate decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question of the passage of this bill the Senator from Louisiana calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cooper, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckingham, Conkling, Merrimon, Washburn, and West—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, and Stockton—33.

So the bill was passed.

JAMES M. TRUE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2207.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2207) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry, of the compensation of colonel of infantry from the 20th of February, 1862, when his recruits were taken from him by order of the Secretary of War, to the 10th of April, 1862, the day upon which he was mustered in as such.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLONEL WILLIAM NORTHEDGE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2091.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2091) for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the personal representatives of William Northedge, deceased, who shall be duly appointed and qualified as such, for the benefit of the widow and children of the deceased, the sum of $7,500 in full for moneys expended by him in subsisting and equipping the Fifty-ninth Regiment New York State Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER J. KNAPP.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3001.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3001) for the relief of Peter J. Knapp was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cause Peter J. Knapp, late a private in Company H, Fifth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers, to be honorably discharged and mustered out of the service, to date with the muster-out of his regiment, and to cause to be paid to him the full sum due him for back-pay and allowances as a soldier of the company and regiment above named; but the Secretary of War is to be satisfied upon investigation that the agreement of Knapp to join the enemy was made while he was incarcerated in a rebel prison, and for the purpose of escaping from imminent peril of death from exposure and hunger, and with a view of escaping to the Union lines.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 800.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 800) to amend the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1864, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to so far amend the eleventh section of the act of June 20, 1864, entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," that the thirty days an officer may be authorized to be absent on leave each year without reduction of pay may become cumulative, so that after several years' continuous service without leave the officer may receive as many months' leave, without reduction of pay, as he has served years without such leave of absence; but such leave of absence is in no case to exceed the term of four months, and the provisions of this are to apply only to such officers as are stationed west of the one hundredth meridian, or in Texas or Dakota.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of Bigler, Young & Co.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HENRY L. DAWES, of Massachusetts, Mr. GEORGE W. MCCRARY, of Iowa, and Mr. SAMUEL S. MARSHALL, of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

JURISDICTION OF CRIMES OF MILITARY PERSONS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 801.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 801) in regard to crimes committed by military persons, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to invest general courts-martial hereafter with a jurisdiction concurrent with that of the courts of the State or Territory in which the crime is committed of the crimes of murder, manslaughter, mayhem, rape, arson, robbery, burglary, larceny, and assault and battery, as well as of attempt to commit, and assault and battery with intent to commit any of those crimes, when they are committed by persons in the military service of the United States or subject to the Articles of War; but the punishments for such offenses are not to exceed those authorized by the laws of the State or Territory in which the crime was committed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADLEIGH subsequently said: The Senate a short time since passed Senate bill No. 801 in regard to crimes committed by military persons. By some mistake the bill was reported favorably when it should have been reported adversely. The committee was against its passage unanimously. I move that the vote by which it was passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote by which this bill was passed will be reconsidered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I now move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

FORT REYNOLDS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1931.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1931) to authorize the sale of the military reservation of Fort Reynolds, in Colorado Territory, and the Government buildings thereon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of War is authorized and empowered by the bill to transfer to the custody and control of the Secretary of the Interior, for disposition for cash, according to the existing laws of the United States relating to the public lands, after appraisement, to the highest bidder, and at not less than the appraised value, nor at less than $1.25 per acre, the United States military reservation of Fort Reynolds, in Colorado Territory, containing about twenty-three square miles as set apart and declared by the President, on June 22, 1868, including all the buildings heretofore erected by the United States, and now being thereon, (the reservation and buildings being no longer needed for military purposes;) and the Secretary of the Interior is to cause the land to be offered in tracts of not more than eighty acres each, and sold separately at public outcry, to the highest bidder, after giving not less than three months' public notice of the time and place of sale in not less than three public newspapers printed and published in the Territory.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHERIDAN O. BREMMER.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2412.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2412) for the relief of Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to direct the Adjutant-General to remove the charge of desertion against Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private in Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, and grant him an honorable discharge; and the proper accounting officer is authorized to audit and pay all claims for bounty and allowances which he would have been entitled to had no charge of desertion been made against him; but no pay or allowances are to be granted to him for the time he was actually absent from his regiment by virtue of a supposed discharge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. M'INTYRE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 311.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 311) for the relief of William J. McIntyre was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William J. McIntyre, late a lieutenant in the Eleventh Illinois Infantry Volunteers, the sum of $199.20, the same being the difference between the pay of a second lieutenant of infantry and a hospital steward, from the 7th of August, 1864, to the 30th of October, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER MINOR.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 671.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 671) for the relief of Alexander Minor, of West Virginia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Alexander Minor, late a private in Company B, of the Twelfth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, United States Army, $234, being the amount of bounty and pay improperly withheld from him on a charge of absence without leave, when, in truth, he was sick and on furlough.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out the words "when, in truth, he was sick and on furlough."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. MORGAN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 546.)

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to authorize the payment of fifty dollars to William B. Morgan, late sergeant Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, as additional bounty under the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, provided he has not already received bounty under the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR J. W. NICHOLS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 769.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 769) for the relief of Major J. W. Nichols, paymaster United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the payment to Major J. W. Nichols, paymaster United States Army, of $4,500, erroneously charged to and paid by him in the settlement of his accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNSERVICEABLE ORDNANCE STORES.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3257.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3257) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to cause to be sold, in such manner and at such times and places and in such quantities as shall most conduce to the interest of the United States, all obsolete and unserviceable fixed ammunition and leaden balls and the surplus of pig-lead in excess of two thousand tons now stored in the various arsenals of the United States, and to cause the net proceeds of such sale after paying all costs and expenses of breaking up and preparing the ammunition for sale and all the necessary expenses of such sale, including the cost of transportation to the place of sale, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States with full accounts of the expenses.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, to strike out the word "fixed" before the word "ammunition."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING BOUNTY CLAIMS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3303.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3303) to extend the time of filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By the provisions of the bill the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, and which expired by limitation on the 30th day of January, 1874, is revived and extended until the 30th of January, 1875; and all claims for such bounties filed in the proper Department after the 30th of January, 1874, and before the passage of this act, are to be deemed to have been filed in due time, and are to be considered and decided without refiling.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL H. KELLY.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 841.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 841) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly, deceased, upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, to date December 1, 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISCHARGE OF OFFICERS OF TENTH COLORED ARTILLERY.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1051.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1051,) for the honorable discharge from their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (heavy,) and directing their honorable muster-out of the service of the United States as of the date of their dismissal.

The preamble to the bill recites that Captain J. Horace McGuire, Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (heavy,) was, on the 8th of September, 1866, dismissed the service of the United States by virtue of General Order No. 4, headquarters Department of the Gulf, September 8, 1866, pursuant to the sentence of a general court-martial; that First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, of the same regiment, were, on the 13th of September, 1866, severally dismissed the service of the United States by virtue of General Order No. 5, headquarters Department of the Gulf, September 13, 1866, pursuant to the sentence of a general court-martial, which several general orders and sentences were approved by General Court-martial Order No. 210, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, November 16, 1866; and that the several sentences, although within the letter of the law and Articles of War, and founded upon proceedings regularly conducted, were, nevertheless, manifestly disproportionate to the offense charged, and therefore unjust, and have worked great and unnecessary injury to the reputations of the officers named. The bill therefore directs the Secretary of War to cause these officers to be honorably discharged from the several positions from which they were dismissed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SELDEN CONNOR.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2704.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2704) for the relief of Selden Connor, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Selden Connor, late lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh Regiment of Maine Volunteer Infantry, $200, or so much thereof as he shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department that the horse was worth, for a horse shot and killed in 1863, by order of the colonel of the regiment while Connor was absent from his regiment on detached duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLEMENT OF ARMY AND NAVY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1828.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1828) to further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy, approved June 23, 1870, and continued by the act approved June 7, 1872, is further continued by this bill for one year from June 23, 1874, and no longer.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE A. BACON.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3003.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3003) for the relief of George A. Bacon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to pay George A. Bacon, late lieutenant-colonel of the Fifteenth Illinois Cavalry, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant-colonel of cavalry from the 31st of December, 1862, to the 3d of April, 1863, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN FLETCHER.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 792.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell, $1,399.35 for overdeductions by the Government of the United States for transportation of military supplies from Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, to Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, in the year 1867.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3431.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3431) authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona no longer required for military purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Department of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, such parts of what are known as the Fort Yuma, Fort Whipple, and Camp Date Creek reservations, in the Territory of Arizona, as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be no longer required for military purposes; but the Secretary of the Interior is to expose the same at public offering for sale to the highest bidder in the legal subdivision not greater than one quarter-section when the same can be made, and not below the minimum price provided by law; and any land left unsold at such offering is to be held thereafter for disposal as other public lands. Notice of such public sale is to be published for sixty days in two newspapers each, one published in the capital of the Territory, and the other circulating nearest the place of sale.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That bona fide settlers, upon any part of said lands prior to the declaration of the reservation-lines, shall have a right to acquire title to the lands so occupied by them at said time, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres each, under the land laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona as may be no longer required for military purposes."

ALFRED FRY.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1108.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1108) for the relief of Alfred Fry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Alfred Fry, late captain in the Seventy-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry from the 30th of August, 1863, the date of his commission, to the 17th of May, 1865, the date that he was mustered as captain, as if he had been mustered as captain on the date of his commission, first deducting whatever sum may have been paid him as lieutenant during the period for which pay is hereby allowed as captain.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC RISEDEN.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3002.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3002) for the relief of Isaac Riseden, late a first lieutenant of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Paymaster-General of the Army is directed by the bill to pay Isaac Riseden, late an acting lieutenant of Company E, Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry, the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of cavalry, from the 15th of August, 1863, to the 10th of March, 1865, after deducting therefrom any sum which he may have received for his services during that time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT SUTHERLAND.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 958.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 958) for the relief of Robert Sutherland was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Paymaster-General of the Army to pay to Robert Sutherland, late second lieutenant Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, the full pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of cavalry from the 30th of June to the 14th of September, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES B. THOMPSON.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 600.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 600) for the relief of Captain James B. Thompson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that James B. Thompson, late of Company G, First Pennsylvania Rifles, was captured while in the line of his duty, May 30, 1864, at the battle of Bethesda Church, Virginia; that on the 6th of June, 1864, he was commissioned first lieutenant in Company F, One hundred and ninetieth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and on the 19th of September, 1864, another commission was issued to him as captain in the same company and regiment, he being at the issuing of both commissions absent as a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy; that he endured the horrors and privations of Andersonville for a period of nearly seven months, escaping twice and being once run down and recaptured by hounds, but at the third attempt, eluding his pursuers and reaching the Union lines at Atlanta, Georgia, after traveling for one whole month entirely by night; and that his failure to be mustered was through no fault or neglect of his own, but solely by reason of his unavoidable detention as a prisoner of war. The bill therefore directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay James B. Thompson the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of infantry in active service from June 6, 1864, to September 19, 1864; and to pay him the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry in active service from September 19, 1864, to March 1, 1865, from which date his muster as an officer commences.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JONATHAN D. HALE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3183.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3183) for the relief of Jonathan D. Hale, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to pay to Jonathan D. Hale $3,425 in full for services rendered in the late war as recruiting officer, scout, and guide for the United States Army, and for two horses lost in the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT GRATIOT RESERVATION.

Mr. LOGAN. I now ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 3335.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there are several bills which have been reported since the Calendar was printed and which the Clerk has in their order.

Mr. LOGAN. I am just calling attention to them. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3335.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3335) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company, Port Huron, Michigan, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to grant a permit to the Port Huron City street railroad to lay and use a curved track over the northwest corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation in a curve having a radius of fifty-four feet and encroaching upon the reservation about fifteen feet from the angle.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

D. R. HAGGARD.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2939.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2939) to compensate D. R. Haggard for six months' services as colonel of the Fifth Kentucky United States Cavalry Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that D. R. Haggard, of Burksville, Cumberland County, Kentucky, was, on the 1st of October, 1861, commissioned a colonel of the Fifth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, United States Army, in the war of the late rebellion; that he was shortly thereafter transferred to cavalry service, and was immediately thereafter put into and did engage in the active service of his country, and did continue in active service to the close of the war; that he was not mustered in the service of the Army until after six months from the date of his commission and engagement in active service; and that he has never received any pay or compensation for his six months' service prior to his muster-in. The bill therefore directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to D. R. Haggard the sum of $1,422, which shall be in full for all sums due him for his services and all perquisites.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH PITTSBURGH ARSENAL GROUNDS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 854.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 854) extending the right of way heretofore granted to the Alleghany Valley Railroad Company through the arsenal grounds at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to authorize the Alleghany Valley Railroad Company to extend its tracks over and occupy the ground between the present track and the Alleghany River where the track, under the act approved February 14, 1853, was laid through the grounds of the United States at and near the Alleghany arsenal, in the county of Alleghany, in the State of Pennsylvania; but the mode and purpose of occupation is first to be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War; and the value of the right of way herein granted, as fixed by him or such officer as he may detail to make such valuation, is to be paid into the Treasury before occupation in pursuance of this act.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, so as to make the proviso read as follows:

Provided, That the mode and purpose of occupation shall first be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War; and the value of the right of way herein granted, as fixed by a board of Army officers as the Secretary of War may detail to make such valuation, shall be paid into the Treasury before occupation in pursuance of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS SIMMS.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2892.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2892) for the relief of Thomas Simms, late a lieutenant in the Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be paid to Thomas Simms, late second lieutenant Company G, Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, the sum of $590, being the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant for the period of six months, between the 25th of December, 1862, and the 1st of May, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT FOR PROPERTY LOST IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3428.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3428) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the first section of the act of March 3, 1849, providing for the payment for horses and equipments lost by officers or enlisted men in the military service shall not be construed to deny payment to such officers or enlisted men for horses which may have been purchased by them in States in insurrection; and payment in any case is not to be refused where the loss resulted from any exigency or necessity of the military service, unless it was caused by the fault or negligence of such officers or enlisted men.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to insert as an additional section the following:

That no claims under said section or this amendment thereto shall be considered unless presented prior to the 1st day of January, 1876.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JULIUS GRIESENBECK.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3431.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill has been passed.

Mr. WINDOM. If we have got so nearly through as to pass a bill the second time, I ask to take up the resolution reported by myself on the 13th day of May with reference to transportation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are only two more military bills.

Mr. WINDOM. I waive my motion, then, for the present.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2087.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to instruct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas, the sum of $212.50, which is to be in full for his claim for supplies furnished by him for a detachment of the United States Cavalry, under command of Sergeant Von Urick, in the service of the United States, at Waco, Texas, in the year 1868.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REUBEN M. PRATT.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 794) to legalize the muster of Reuben M. Pratt as second lieutenant, to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole It directs the Secretary of the War to place the name of Reuben M. Pratt on the rolls of Company K, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps Infantry, as a second lieutenant, and recognizes his muster into service as such heretofore made to date from the 1st day of August, 1862.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be taken or construed as granting any claim against the United States except the right of pension to the minor children of said Reuben M. Pratt.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CANNON FOR SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT MASSILLON.

Mr. LOGAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 924) granting condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes, to report it back favorably; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver, if it can be done without detriment to the Government, three condemned cannon to the city of Massillon, Ohio, for the purpose of erecting a bronze statue on a soldiers' monument in that city.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. R. STRAUSS.

Mr. LOGAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 801) for the relief of L. R. Strauss, of Macon City, Missouri, to report it back favorably, and I ask to have it acted upon at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair noticing that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is in the Senate will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on House bill No. 1572.

THE CURRENCY—FREE BANKING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the message of the House of Representatives announcing that the House had non-concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, and asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think anything is to be gained by any further efforts at this sort of contrivance; and therefore in some way or other I wish to test the sense of the Senate as to going on with this scheme of namby-pambyism with the House of Representatives over something where the more we confer the further off we seem to be in respect to coming to an agreement. I move to refer the subject to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is, I suppose, not strictly in order now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon of the Senator. If it is not strictly in order, I do not make the motion; but I submit that it is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe with the Senator from Vermont that it is idle for us to waste any further time in talking about an agreement on this bill. At the same time, a request for a committee of conference is very rarely refused. It is a request I never have known refused. I do not know a single case where either House has refused to confer with the other when it has been asked, and several conferences are very common. A motion to adhere is a very unusual motion in a parliamentary body, and this is equivalent to a motion to adhere.

If the Senator from Iowa thinks we can have any better success in another conference than its predecessor had I have no objection to letting him try it. I shall vote, therefore, for a new conference, as the House has asked it. The House, by a very large majority—I am told as high as thirty or forty—decided against the report presented by the first conference, and ask for another conference. That request comes, as a matter of course, from the majority of the House. Now, for us to refuse to grant that conference would be an unusual thing. I shall therefore vote for the conference, without any expectation that any result will be arrived at. This is an unusual motion to refuse to confer with the House. The majority who disagreed to the report of the first committee of conference, as a matter of course, are the majority who ask for this further conference, of course, but I will not deny them the conference they desire. I hope that the usual motion made by the Senator from Iowa will be agreed to, that the conference will be ordered, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate will meet those of the House. If they can agree, well and good; if not, which I think is probable, then that is the end of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The sooner this subject is disposed of the happier will be the people of the United States. So long as we keep this thing going like a crosscut-saw across the necks of the people, so long we may expect that there will be irritation and dissatisfaction. As long as there was any hope that any scheme could be devised which would satisfy reasonable expectations, I mean personally reasonable expectations of men who I think are in error, but who are just as well entitled to their opinion as I am to mine, I was willing to have conferences as often as anybody, and as long as the Senator from Ohio, I suppose. But as we all know that any further conference on this subject, as the thing is now situated, will be a pure delusion; that views are so irreconcilably opposed, and human language is so entirely inadequate, as we have seen by this last report, to express what either side wishes to have done, I think the sooner we make a clean cut of this business and stop it, the better it will be. Then we shall find the people of the United States just where the law leaves them now, with a certain amount of currency, with a certain amount of pledged public faith in platforms and in statutes to come to specie payments at the earliest practicable time, and the people will know also that taking the two Houses together it does not seem to be thought that this is the earliest practicable time, and outside of that the law is as well now as it can be, except that people in the West think they have not their share of circulation which they ought to have for the purpose of setting up banks.—The people of the East by their Representatives have unanimously said to the people of the West "Take your share; take it presently; if there is any difficulty in the existing law take a fresh one; only take it and let us have done with any cause of complaint, just or unjust, any insufficiency, real or supposed, in respect to the amount of circulation that you are to have, and go your way in peace and let us all help together to get on." All that has been said.

Now, when we know what the views of the House of Representatives are as far as we can calculate a differential calculus, and when we know what our own views are as far as each one can understand his own views for himself, (which I believe is about as far as we have gone,) why not leave it just where it stands? Everybody sees that there is no fruit fit for the honest people of this country to eat to grow from this tree. Where is the use, then, of scraping and pruning and shaking the branches any more? Let us pass to-morrow, if you will, the bill which gives to the people of the West who wish to set up banks their share of the existing circulation, because when I voted for it the other day I voted for it in earnest and good-will and cheerfulness; and the failure of their effort to get what they may think is desirable in this way will not in the least degree absolve me at this session—I do not pronounce for any further, because we want to know at some time whether it is to be asked or not—from the duty of saying, just as cheerfully again, "Take your full share of all banking facilities now out." If that strips the State of Vermont of three-fourths of her banking facilities, it will not strip her of any currency that belongs to her people, for whatever is owing to them I suppose will be paid, and whatever money they have I suppose they will be entitled to keep; but so far as concerns its banking-corporations, in one of which the little that I possess in this world is embraced in the form of stock, I say for that and every other one of those institutions and for the people of Vermont, "Take it; take it with a good will, not grudgingly. You feel that you are entitled to it. I waive any discussion as to whether you are or not; only take it." To go further than that now seems to be perfectly impossible. Perhaps it is wise that we should not go further.

I believe in what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] said the other day as to how, even if we stand in the present attitude, we shall grow out of it if only we hold fast to that public faith which in platform and statute we have put forth to the world. If we will hold on and will not go backward, we shall grow to the time when we can pay. Let us do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very much gratified indeed if the Senator from Vermont does not live to see the day when he will regret the defeat of the proposition now pending on the table of the President. I believe myself that the action of Congress thus far on this bill will do more to delay the accomplishment of the result that he and I at least are in favor of, the resumption of a specie standard, than any event that has happened during this session of Congress. Perhaps I am mistaken; and if I am mistaken as the result proves, and we are able to reach the specie standard before the time fixed under the bill passed by the Senate yesterday, I shall acknowledge my error. If, however, he is here with me at the time when that bill would have brought us to the specie standard, and he finds that by reason of its defeat his desire and mine has been defeated, he probably will confess his error.

But that is not the question here. The House of Representatives have by a majority of more than three to one—I am told nearly four to one; but I am not sure of the figures, at any rate by an overwhelming majority—asked for this committee of conference, having first disagreed, as they had a right to do from opposite stand-points, to the proposition sent to them. Men who are utterly opposed to specie payments at any time, or appear to be, voted against the proposition; men who are for specie payments promptly voted against it. They acted from opposite stand-points. That same majority which thus defeated this proposition, and others who voted for it, then joined in this request, an ordinary parliamentary request, for another conference; and will the Senate deny it? I do not fear that the Senate will do so. It is a very rare thing for one House to deny a request for a conference proposed by the other. The whole matter will be open before this conference. They can do nothing without our assent. Why not let them confer if they can, and agree?

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did not the Senator from Ohio vote against the last proposal of the House of Representatives for a conference on this very bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I voted against the bill of the House. The two motions were put together on insisting upon our amendment and agreeing to the conference, and I voted against the House proposition undoubtedly.

When this matter was brought up I had hoped that without any division in the Senate this conference would be agreed upon, but I express my fear that there will be no agreement. My expectation is that there will be no agreement. There being such a wide difference of opinion in regard to this bill and the subject-matters embraced in it, I think it probable that the conferees will not be able to agree. The previous committee, whose report has just been voted down in the House, were together for a week on the subject, yielding and conferring, yielding and conferring on both sides. Our work is not satisfactory to both Houses of Congress. We have no right to complain. We saw the difficulties ourselves. I anticipated the difficulty that has occurred; I looked for it; but because we were not able to present a proposition that Congress could agree upon, is it therefore to be said that some others may not be able to present a proposition that will be agreed to by both Houses? Sir, I do not assume to myself any such infallibility as this. Because that which we agreed upon was not sanctioned by both Houses of Congress it does not follow that by the progress we have already made to an agreement a new committee may not propose some proposition which will be acceptable to both Houses and will become the law of the land.

Under these circumstances, without engaging in the debate as to the merits of this proposition, I simply say that I will vote for this proposed conference and for any other that is asked by the House on this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator speaks as a reason for going for this conference of the progress that has been made toward an agreement by the last one. I think the Senator is a little infelicitous in that illustration, for the last conference has left us, according to the majority to which he has referred, farther apart than we were when the subject was last before the two Houses.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to correct him in a point of fact. The House disagreed to the bill sent by the Senate by a majority of seventy or eighty, and now the majority for the conference bill yesterday was larger than it has ever been in this body, and the majority in the House against it is only one-half what it was in the former case. So the Senator is mistaken in the point of the approaches to an agreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I am not mistaken. I repeat, that I think the two Houses are left farther apart than they were before; and to prove that I quote the honorable Senator from Ohio, who says that he has no expectation that we shall agree now, that he feared before we should not; and yet until this time we have had him and the others looking to an agreement. Now, if we have made progress and are coming nearer and nearer together, then I should be glad to know upon what system of philosophy it is that the Senator says that there is less hope, the nearer we come together, than there was when we were wider apart? I confess that the limited understanding I have of dialectics does not enable me to appreciate the force of that way of putting things.

Sir, the proposition that I make is not to refuse a conference with the House of Representatives and send the bill back to them with that refusal, which the Senator thinks might be discourteous, but which, standing up for the privileges of this body as I know the House of Representatives would stand up for its own, is a question which ought not to be brought into consideration here. We are under no obligation to confer with the House of Representatives upon this subject any further, either moral or legal or of courtesy, unless we think—which is a subject for ourselves alone—that the public interests will be advanced by it.

Now what are we to submit to a new conference? Does the Senator mean to say that the new conferees on the part of the Senate, representing its opinion if anybody can tell what that opinion is, are to be free—I do not mean in the technical sense, but are in the moral sense to be perfectly unlimited by any judgment of the Senate and are to have a carte blanche to make any arrangement with the House of Representatives that they please, although it may embrace propositions which have not been discussed here at all and which have not therefore been brought under the judgment of the Senate at all? Does the Senator mean that? Would he as the head of the Committee on Finance in this body consent, if a bill were to come here for the first time, that we should immediately hasten to a conference upon it without any guide, as it respects the management of that conference on the part of the Senate, as to what these agents of the Senate were to do? He would not expect it. He would say it was committing to the agents an unlimited power without any guide as it should respect the directions or the length to which our agents should go.

I am unwilling, Mr. President, to put the small interest comparatively, it is true that I represent here, speaking in the local sense, into the charge of any committee unless I know in substance within what scope that committee is confined. Here you have had this bill with the scheme of the House of Representatives within certain limits. You have had our amendments within certain limits. You have sent them to a conference; and if they did not go outside of those limits I am very much mistaken, but no criticism was made upon that, and I do not propose to make any now; but all that this committee has done has failed, although this body agreed to their report it is true, as the Senator says, by a larger majority than ever before, because the Senator himself and two others who had hitherto resisted the temptation, or the coercion, or the influence, or whatever thing it may be that should lead them in that direction, turned their faces toward the setting sun and went. Very well, they had a perfect right to do that, and nobody questions either their motive or their patriotism in doing it. So it is true that as three is to the whole body there was a larger vote. Suppose it to be a perfectly right one, the House of Representatives say "We will have none of any such thing as that; we repudiate it altogether."

What are the topics, then, within what limitations, then, subject to what guides and rules, then, are we to say that our conferees are to act? It is for that very reason that it appears to me, although I find the Senator disagrees with me, to my amazement, that we ought, without any supposable discourtesy to the House of Representatives, to send this matter to the honorable Senator's committee, who know so well how to treat it, in order that they may propose to us some limitation, some guide, some plan which, when agreed to, may be submitted, either with a conference or without it as the Senate may please, to the House of Representatives. In that way we shall know what it is we are standing upon when we send out of the Chamber this subject for our consideration by our agents again. That is my object. It is not my object to destroy, it is not my object to cut off. It is only my desire that the Senator's committee shall report to us tomorrow what in this attitude of the subject it is best to do, and I confess my surprise that my friend from Ohio should object to that, because even from his point of view it is not a refusal of a conference; it is only saying (and not saying it to them because we cannot communicate this action to the House that we refer it to a committee) that we will sleep on it over night and ask a respected and honored committee of our body to think of it over night and let us know their judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator, suppose this bill is now referred to the Committee on Finance, what question is referred? Simply the question as to whether we ought under the circumstances to grant another committee of conference. If I understand the rules—but perhaps I am in error—the Committee on Finance would have no right to report amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is vastly mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that the Committee on Finance would be simply required to pass upon the request of the House of Representatives for another conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that were all I should not ask it. I rise now, Mr. President, to a parliamentary inquiry. I have moved to refer this bill and the amendments to the Committee on Finance. The Senator from Ohio suggests that the Committee on Finance would have no power to propose fresh amendments or to do anything upon the subject except simply to consider whether there ought to be a conference. I make the point—though perhaps it is not strictly a point of order which the Chair is bound to decide—and so I make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair whether that statement of the Senator is correct or whether mine is correct, that it being referred to the committee, all the amendments that were reported upon and agreed upon before are entirely open, and they can report the House bill with any amendments they like.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it is so. It never was questioned before in the whole history of legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take the opinion of the Chair. I have not looked at the parliamentary law, but my understanding always was that after a conference has been ordered by the two Houses and the request is made by one House to grant another conference the whole matter was closed except to either adhere or to grant another conference or to further insist; and committing it to a committee of its own body would only raise the question whether, under the circumstances, we should grant another committee of conference. That is a new point to me. I have never heard the question made before.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senate has a right to recede from its amendments and agree with the House. Of course, if it has a right to recede, it has a right to ascertain through a committee if it ought to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The error of my friend from Ohio is that he is confounding the request for a conference with the power of the two Houses over the amendments which are the subject of disagreement. Now, separate these questions; they are entirely distinct. Suppose the House had sent back the bill simply saying that they had disagreed to the Senate amendments. Then we refer it to the Committee on Finance, and the question is entirely at large; they can submit anything they like. But the Senator acts upon the idea that the two things are so united as coming from the House that they cannot be separated. That is an error. I am sure it is so clear that I need not spend time to discuss it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, for years there has been a complaint that certain Eastern States have had an undue proportion of the national banks and of the national-bank currency; and four years ago we passed an act to redistribute $25,000,000 of that currency, giving it to the States who were deficient. We now have the opportunity to redistribute forty-six or fifty million dollars of that currency, still leaving the East with a greater proportion than the rest of the country. Now shall we throw away that opportunity? That is the real question and the practical question. If we continue the debate on financial measures such as have occupied the greater portion of the session, I despair of our coming to any agreement, and the opportunity to redistribute this currency, which is now offered to us, will be lost. It seems to me that, looking at it in a practical point of view, no man from a State which has a deficiency ought to hesitate. It is a matter of very little importance to the State from which I come, for Ohio has very nearly, though not quite, her proportion; but there are States that have scarcely any banking facilities at all under the national-bank act, and who possibly might be benefited or at least think they would be benefited by a redistribution that should enable them to organize banks within their own borders.

We have, as I said, the opportunity now to gratify their wishes, and, as they suppose, to promote their interests if we do not throw it away. But if we are to spend the rest of the six or seven days that we have of this session in a fruitless discussion of the very same subjects upon which for the last six months we have been unable to agree, we voluntarily throw away the opportunity which is now offered. I appeal, therefore, to every man who comes from those States that complain of this unfair distribution of the currency, as it is called, to decide between taking what it is in his power to obtain or throwing it away in a fruitless effort to obtain something else.

I say nothing, Mr. President, of how this disproportion in the distribution of the currency took place. I have no condemnation of those who availed themselves of this law as it stood or had the means to avail themselves of it at that time, and procured thereby more than their share. That is a matter which it is useless now to consider. The practical question is, can there be a remedy? And I think it perfectly clear that there can be a remedy to the extent of a redistribution of forty-five or forty-six or fifty million dollars; and therefore once more I say, the practical question for every man coming from the States in which there is a deficiency of banking circulation, is to say, "Shall I take that which I can obtain, or shall I throw that away in the pursuit, and a vain pursuit, of something that I more desire?"

There is a little difficulty, it is true, in the motion made by the Senator from Vermont, because it seems to ask those who are opposed to the Senate amendment to adhere to that amendment. Usually it is for the friends of the amendment to adhere to it.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will pardon me. The motion is merely to refer to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is to refer, there is no difficulty whatsoever in the way; but I hope the members from the States who have a deficiency of currency will take a practical view of this subject and take that which they can obtain. It is useless to think that this question can be settled at this session of Congress. This question of the currency is one that has to go before the country. Men have to take their stand on one side or the other of it, and to stand or to fall by the flag that they carry. All attempts at smothering this question in Congress will be utterly futile. It has to go into the debates before the people, and their voice has to be heard, and every man on his conscience must take the responsibility of advocating the one side or the other of the question which will be presented to the people. Ultimately it will be reduced to a single question, in my humble judgment, a question between a sound currency or an irredeemable currency for all time to come. Let every man take his stand one way or the other, and let him abide the result; and if he takes a stand which his conscience shall approve, although he may be condemned and may fall, he will at least have the satisfaction of having done his duty.

I hope, sir, that the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer this bill to the Finance Committee will prevail. I would be very far from refusing a conference asked by the House of Representatives if I saw the least possible hope of any good result; but seeing no hope whatever of any good result, I trust this matter will be sent to the Finance Committee and that the bill for the redistribution of the currency will be taken up and passed.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to ask the Chair the parliamentary question that I put before, whether it would be in order for the Committee on Finance, if this bill were referred to them, to report a provision in lieu of our amendments that are now pending for the redistribution of the currency that has been referred to by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a point of order that the Chair can rule upon; but the opinion of the Chair is that if this bill be sent to the Committee on Finance, they will have the power to recommend anything that the Senate has the power to do in regard to the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, in view of the suggestions that have been made, I can see no good to come from again referring this subject to the Committee on Finance. There is on the Calendar of the Senate to-day a bill providing for the redistribution of the national-bank currency which has already been before the Senate upon several occasions, which, if I am not mistaken, can be taken up for consideration on a motion, whenever it is the pleasure of the Senate to do so. I can see, however, that until the last ray of hope has faded from the horizon, we ought not to abandon the idea of doing something with the finance bill that has heretofore been before us.

The Senator from Vermont made a reference, complimentary or otherwise, I do not know which, to those who through pressure or through coercion or through some instrumentality had turned their faces toward the setting sun. Well, Mr. President, I do not know that it is disreputable in any one to turn to the sun when it sets the same face that he turned when it arose. I do not know that the history of the world furnishes us with any sect of worshipers of any other than the rising sun. There have been many such who worship the rising sun or the sun at noon-day. Sir, looking at the condition of the country as it has been from December to the present hour, what has it been? Those who advocate an expansion of the currency upon the one hand pulling it in one direction, those who advocate a contraction of it pulling it in the other, and, like any other body in nature operated upon by two equal forces in opposing directions, it has stood still—stagnation, paralysis in business, the precursors of death.

Now, the Senator from Vermont says we are turning toward the setting sun. We are pledged, not to resume specie payments at the earliest practicable moment, but to take measures for the resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable moment. The measure before us is not the best one which might be proposed; it is not as good a one as I would like to have, as my votes in this body have indicated; but because I believe it to be a measure tending in that direction, however others may differ from me, I have voted for it; and looking at the fact that that measure does fix a day when legal-tender notes issued by the Government will be redeemed either in bonds or in specie, that it provides for diminishing the volume by $82,000,000, I have believed that that is taking a measure for the purpose of bringing about specie payments, and the vote which I cast for the conference report I deemed a vote in redemption of the first pledge I gave upon entering into this body.

Sir, I believe that if the two Houses of Congress can adopt a measure such as the one which has been proposed, we shall be relieving business from some degree of that stagnation and paralysis which has fallen upon it, and I shall vote for another conference committee so long as there is a hope or an hour left in which I believe this result can be accomplished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator on that principle why it was that he voted against the last conference being granted?

Mr. SCOTT. According to my recollection I did not vote against the last conference. I voted against the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the 30th of May the RECORD shows that this took place; this very bill being under consideration, House bill No. 1572:

> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate insist on its amendment and grant the conference asked by the House of Representatives.
> The yeas and nays were ordered.
> The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Then occurs the statement of a couple of pairs, which I will pass to save time.

Mr. SCOTT. That I suppose was the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to adhere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will read again:

> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate insist on its amendment and grant the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood that; but I understand that the part which the Senator proposed to omit was something which I supposed was the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will read it so that the Senator may see that I am not skipping in order to put him in a false position:

> The yeas and nays were ordered.
> The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.
> Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this motion.
> The roll-call was concluded.
> Mr. KELLY, (who had voted in the negative.) I wish to withdraw the vote I gave. I forgot that I was paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. DENNIS] now absent. He would vote for the motion; I should vote against it.
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn if there be no objection.
> The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 24; as follows.

If I shall not be likely to be misunderstood I will only read those names in the nays to which this question refers, if it is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I read:

NAYS—Messrs. * * * Scott, Sherman. * * * *

That is all.

Mr. SCOTT. Now, if the Senator from Vermont, who is so much better a parliamentarian than I am, can inform me how I could vote for insisting on the amendments of the Senate without voting at the same time as he supposes I did against the committee of conference, I would be obliged to him. The first question was, shall we insist on the Senate amendments; but that was coupled with asking for a committee of conference. I voted for insisting, and must have done so necessarily.

Mr. CONKLING. No; you voted against insisting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator voted against insisting, and therefore he voted against the committee of conference. That was the way we all voted on this side of the question, and the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Pennsylvania voted with us. Those who were willing to have a conference to consider the question without standing by firmly where we were already and refusing to confer upon it, voted the other way, and they had the majority.

Mr. SCOTT. I had for the moment misapprehended the position in speaking of the Senate bill. I was referring to the Senate bill as reported from the Committee on Finance; and remembering that the Senate bill was so amended that I voted against it, then I voted against insisting upon those amendments. I could not do otherwise for the purpose of getting a committee of conference. It was impossible that I should do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator stood then in exactly the position where I stand now if I am forced to come to a note now; but I want the Finance Committee to consider it. If I am to vote now I shall vote against having a conference with the House of Representatives, as I did before in respect to the attitude that we stood upon.

Mr. SCOTT. I have not been questioning the right of the Senator to vote either way, nor his consistency in voting either way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, but the Senator has stated that we were bound to vote for this conference as we always had, and so on, and so said the Senator from Ohio, and I was simply showing to the Senator that in that respect he was mistaken; that a few days ago on this very question both the Senators voted precisely as I now ask the Senate to vote, only that, short of that, making a less severe motion, I ask that the subject be considered by the Committee on Finance first.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have not examined the record to see how I voted on the last proposition for a committee of conference between the two Houses. So far as I have any recollection about it I was so utterly bewildered at the time the vote was taken that I did not know and did not pretend to know how I ought to vote in order to secure the best chance for realizing some one of the hopes with which I set out at the commencement of this session. I am inclined to think I did not vote on that proposition; but my recollection is somewhat more distinct upon this point, that the two Houses of Congress not agreeing together upon the same proposition did agree to have a conference, and named their respective committees, and that those committees met together and reported to their respective Houses not a disagreement, but an agreement upon a single proposition, in my judgment not the best measure the case is capable of, but a measure which I said yesterday and which I believe to-day is the best which has been submitted to the Senate with any fair show of being accepted by the two Houses. The Senate by rather a striking majority agreed to it. The House by a majority also striking—striking not so much by the numbers of its majority as by the paucity of it—disagreed to that proposition. Why the House disagreed to it, how they were induced, what were the controlling motives that brought about that disagreement on the part of the House, I am sure I do not know.

The House, I am told, by a very large majority has, however, instead of abandoning the hope of legislation—the effort to legislate upon this great question—asked for another committee of conference. Well, sir, I think it is the part of wisdom, to say nothing about courtesy, nothing about parliamentary law—I know nothing about parliamentary law and nothing about courtesy, and not much about wisdom, but I think it is the part of wisdom to comply with that invitation. It does not cost much just to name another committee. Let them meet the committee on the part of the House; let them see whether they can find anything more acceptable to both the Houses than the last committee did agree upon. There is no evidence before us to show that there is an irreconcilable difference between the two Houses. So far as we have experimented on the subject the evidence leads us to the conclusion that there is no one proposition upon which one House is determined while the other House is as obstinately opposed to that proposition and bent upon some other one proposition. I am not at all sure but that there is a fair prospect that another committee of conference between the two Houses would agree as the last committee of conference did agree, and I know of no conclusive evidence which ought to persuade us that another committee of conference would not finally evolve a measure that would be satisfactory to both Houses. But when it will cost so little to try the experiment, why not try it? On the contrary the proposition is to send this dispute to the Committee on Finance of the Senate. The Committee on Finance of the Senate has had every syllable of this dispute under consideration from the 1st of December last until this time. Every syllable of this dispute and of every dispute involved in this whole financial question, the Committee on Finance have had before them since we met in December last. What possible aid can that committee give us if we submit the question again? We do not want a committee to tell the Senate to-day upon a new investigation of the financial question what wisdom dictates to the country. The whole Senate, with all the light the committee could furnish it, has been considering that month after month and, I may say truthfully, year after year.

It would be fair, I think, to assume that the Senate has certain views upon this subject pretty well matured by this time. The trouble in our position is that our views do not seem to be in harmony with the views of the House. Now we do not want to confer any further with the Finance Committee; we want to confer with a committee of the House. We know to-day whether or not we can agree with the Finance Committee. The thing we want to know is whether we can agree with the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Finance it seems to me can tell us nothing about that. A conference committee it seems to me can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You speak of the difference between us and the House. Can you tell us what it is?

Mr. HOWE. My honorable friend from Vermont asks me if I can tell what the difference is between the Senate and the House on this question. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "That is what no fellow can find out."

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; I do not concede that it is one of Dundreary's problems. I am inclined to think a committee of conference might find out, and that is one of the reasons why I favor another committee of conference. I am satisfied it is one of those things which the Committee on Finance on the part of the Senate cannot find out. Therefore I do not see any propriety in consulting that committee any further.

I did not rise particularly to say either of the things which I have said. I rose more particularly for another purpose. In a hesitating and stumbling sort of way yesterday I voted for the report of the late committee of conference on this bill. I acknowledged when I cast that vote, or I should have acknowledged if I had been questioned upon the point, that I was a republican, and in fact I acknowledge that I am bound by the stipulations which the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio have recited here on the floor of the Senate. I am a party to that old compact by which we undertook to pay the national debt—every farthing. I stand by it still, and I acknowledge that those notes which you call greenbacks are a part of the national debt. I have agreed to the propriety of paying them. If I fall back from that promise one hair's breadth I acknowledge I am open to the rebuke not merely of the Senator from Vermont but of the Senator from Ohio who usually sits farthest from me, [Mr. THURMAN;] so I thought I might be allowed to say that if I have fallen back at all from the obligation of that promise it is unbeknown to me. I did not think I was doing it yesterday, nor do I see precisely how either the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Ohio is leading me to the performance of that promise or any part of it.

Sir, the Senator from Vermont and I are agreed that your debt ought to be paid, and if you have not paid it as fast as you could pay it you are to blame. Well, sir, I voted for a bill yesterday which, in process of time, would have paid eighty-two millions of the worst and meanest part of your debt, of the part that earns nothing to the holder. I agreed to that yesterday. If the Senator from Vermont, or any other Senator, says that that is not enough to pay, I acknowledge it; I confess all that; but what do they ask us to pay? How do they propose to pay a dollar? Standing here and harping upon our obligation to pay the debt, what does either of these Senators propose as a way of paying it? Why, says the Senator from Vermont, echoed by the Senator from Ohio, "We hear you want a more even disposition of banking facilities. Well, take that banking circulation. It is limited by law. We acknowledge that a larger portion of these facilities are enjoyed in the East than by its population or its business the East is entitled to. Take that from us and enjoy yourselves." And the Senator from Ohio holds up his finger admonishing us not to forego that opportunity. The peril is upon our heads if we forego that. Suppose we accept it; how much less is your debt then? You have taken $56,000,000 of banking circulation from New England and New York, and distributed it in the West and South, but then how far have you got along toward paying the national debt?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to impute to me saying that this redistribution would help pay the national debt or anything of that kind?

Mr. HOWE. I should be very reluctant to attribute any declaration of that kind to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. The Senator seems to lead the Senate to imply that that was the panacea for paying the national debt that I had proposed. If he does mean to imply that, he is quite mistaken in my position.

Mr. HOWE. I was leading the Senate to that implication because the Senator from Vermont led me to that implication himself. He stood right there and he did arraign the Senate because of its inattention to the obligation it had assumed to pay the debt. I thought a statesman so astute as the Senator from Vermont would follow that by showing us how we should pay it, when we should pay it; because that is what we have been talking about since the 1st of December to this time—some way of paying the debt. That is one of the ends we aim at. When he came to talk of a specific piece of legislation, it was simply a piece of legislation to take a certain amount of bank circulation from one section of the country and give it to another section of the country. That is all; and the Senator from Ohio followed in that precise vein.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now a word, if the Senator really does not mean to misrepresent me, as I know he does not.

Mr. HOWE. You are quite right in that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know he does not, though the Senator enjoys his little joke as well as other people do. I am sure he really cannot have misapprehended what I said. I am not going to take his time for more than a single moment to state what I did say.

I said that it had been found impossible at this session of Congress and by the persons whom the people and the States have now here to take the step that he and I, I hope together, wish to take, to go, as the Senator from Pennsylvania so felicitously states, toward the rising sun—that is, the sun of honesty, of morning, of fresh air, and all that; but as the Senator from Massachusetts had so earnestly stated, if as we cannot do any better, we could grow to specie payments, which it respects that subject we stood still, as to law-making at least, it would be better than growing the other way. Then I said upon an entirely different subject, referring to the complaint in the West that they had not banking facilities, and the bank circulation which it was supposed would bring banking facilities, the East that were supposed to have a surplus came with open hands and warm hearts and said, "Take your share," not as connected with the question of paying the debt, but as connected with healing a real or supposed grievance on an entirely different branch of the subject.

Mr. HOWE. I am glad to hear that explanation, because it gives me an opportunity to say one more thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is worth something for that, at any rate.

Mr. HOWE. If I am not mistaken in the sentiment of the West, if I am not mistaken in the sentiment of the South, I deem myself authorized to say that neither the West nor the South feels more sensibly the inequality of this distribution of banking circulation, feels more intently the wrong done in that respect, than the wrong done the national creditor that you do not meet your obligation to him. And therefore it is, I claim to-day for the second time—yesterday was the first time—a little precedence over my honorable friend from Vermont on the matter of meeting these obligations. Yesterday I voted for the first proposition which proposed to pay a part of the national debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What proposition was that?

Mr. HOWE. The proposition which proposed to get rid of $82,000,000 of your non-interest-bearing, repudiated, depreciated paper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You mean this conference report.

Mr. HOWE. That is the only thing of the kind that I remember to have voted for yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg leave to suggest that the Senator voted under an immeasurable delusion. It does not do any such thing.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. True.

Mr. CONKLING. So it is.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, that is calculated to embarrass a man of my stature. The Senator from Vermont says I voted under an immeasurable delusion, and here my honorable friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] who never before in his life uttered a word that was not strictly true, undertakes to verify that statement, and even the Senator from Connecticut can be indorsed by my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] I will consider their affidavits, one and all, in the case, and I stand here to repeat once more, one single individual against the trio, and if I stood alone I would say it against any trinity you ever heard of, that yesterday I voted for a proposition to pay $82,000,000 of your depreciated and dishonored paper. I do not think that was enough to do it, but it was the only thing I had the opportunity of doing yesterday.

So I say I am not on the side of those who would repudiate now or ever. I still want as much as ever I wanted every one of our national obligations to be met just as fast as it can be met. I admit if you want to do justice between New England and the South in the mere matter of bank-note circulation you may do that by a redistribution, as you call it. You will by that simple measure pay Paul, but by that measure you rob Peter. "O, but," says the Senator from Vermont, "we concede this; we do it cheerfully; we do it affectionately; we do it with all our hearts; we give it up." Who gives it up? If the Senator from Vermont himself was to yield up that circulation which is to go to the South and to the West I should understand how sincere the offering was. But if it is not to be taken from the Senator from Vermont or from any bank which he represents, but is to come from other institutions, then, although his generosity may not be any the less conspicuous, it will be more human. It will be more like the patriotism of Mr. Artemus Ward, who, if I remember, professed himself ready to sacrifice all his wife's relations in the war—not any of his own nor himself. I take it, Mr. President, that those institutions which are to be lightened in order to contribute these banking facilities for other sections will not be, whatever they may say about it, particularly pleased.

But I did not mean to go into that question at all. I mean to say that does not meet any one of the great issues before the country, and I think we had better make one more effort to meet those issues before we abandon the attempt in utter despair.

Mr. MORTON. Personally I am about as indifferent on this question as on any that has been presented here for some time. Still I think it is our duty to grant the conference asked by the House and permit another attempt to be made to settle this question.

It has been suggested that the passage of the bill now pending before the Senate for a redistribution of the currency, to take $25,000,000, or if you please $46,000,000, from the States in excess, would be satisfactory, and that nothing else should be done at this session. If the Senator from Vermont thinks that this question is to be settled in that way, or by any such process, he is very much mistaken; and when gentlemen talk about $25,000,000, or $46,000,000, equalizing the distribution they are only about half right. It would take $46,000,000 to equalize the distribution if the New England States only had $40,000,000, to which they were entitled at first, instead of getting $110,000,000; but when you concede to them $110,000,000, that they got when they were entitled to less than $40,000,000, and you take $46,000,000 from the $110,000,000, it still leaves them $64,000,000; and now to give to the States West and South what they are entitled to on that basis, would take over $80,000,000. The Senator from Vermont says, "Pass the bill giving them $25,000,000 or $46,000,000, and say nothing more about it; do not ask whether they are entitled to it." That was very kind and magnanimous!

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Indiana how much he told us about a year ago and again a year before that, was necessary to supply the actual wants of the deficient States?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. I think it was something over $40,000,000 upon the original basis.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will find, I am very confident, that when a bill was passed making the addition that it might go to the deficient States, he told us that that was not only more than enough, but my impression is he said in substance that it was double the required amount.

Mr. MORTON. I do not remember what I said; but the figures will show for themselves. The New England States, according to the original proportion, were entitled to less than $40,000,000. They got $110,000,000. Other States in the East received an excess of nearly $11,000,000. It required and will now require over $46,000,000, fully that I should think, to give to the States West and South their proportion, assuming that the other States have only got theirs. But when the New England States start out with $64,000,000, then to equalize upon that basis you have got to give over $80,000,000. That is a different basis entirely.

But, Mr. President, whatever redistribution you may make on that subject does not settle the question before the country. The issue is broadly made before the country now and will not be taken back, that the legal-tender act should be repealed within a year or two, and within two years specie payments resumed. On the other hand it is another issue that there should be nothing done; that is, let the squeezing process go on indefinitely, until by the growth of population and business specie payments shall be forced by mere contraction. That is another issue made and that is to be before the country. According to the progress toward specie payments made by the mere process of doing nothing and holding still, if we are to judge from the progress made during the last four years, it would take about sixty years to arrive at it in that way. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] says we are further off than we were four years ago. I am not one of those who believe you can come to specie payments by mere contraction. You can have all the agony of contraction increasing from year to year and all the suffering from contraction; but as I have argued from time to time, so long as the legal-tender notes are depreciated by law and cannot be received in payment of certain claims, debts, or obligations, you cannot bring them to par by mere contraction. That squeezing process, that slow torture, that refinement of cruelty can go on for years and accomplish nothing.

Mr. President, if it be desirable to leave all these questions open, I shall be as contented as others. It will be the broad question, on the one hand, of contraction, and upon the other hand, it will be the question of such expansion of the volume of the currency from time to time as the growth of the country may demand. It will be the question of repealing the legal-tender act and of taking from a large body of currency in circulation certain qualities and properties that make it valuable, and to depreciate it by law. All these questions will be discussed. I do not intend to discuss them now; but these are the questions to be left open before the country. I am sure if others think that desirable I shall not complain; but my impression is that our duty to the country is to bring about, if we can, a settlement of the financial question. Whether it can be done or not, I do not know. I have made an honest effort, an earnest one, to bring it about, and I am not very hopeful of its being accomplished, but I am willing to permit another effort to be made.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I wish to say a few words more, particularly in regard to the position which my honored friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] takes in regard to the payment of $82,000,000 of the public debt. I appreciate his desire to cancel the public debt. I think it is an obligation resting upon us; it has been resting upon us; and it will continue to rest upon us until we meet it.

The Senator from Wisconsin congratulates himself and rejoices in the opportunity he has had to give one vote by which if the compromise measure were carried out we should cancel $82,000,000 of the public debt. How is it paid? If we issue $1,000,000 of bank-notes in addition to the many millions which are now out, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cancel $375,000 of legal-tender notes, and so the thing goes on until he shall have canceled $82,000,000. But how is he to get the money by which to pay this $82,000,000? From the income of the Government. If the receipts of the Government are sufficient then he does pay it. That is just what I would like to have. But suppose the bank currency is issued so that you put out $218,000,000 of it in order to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cancel $82,000,000 of greenbacks, and there shall not be within that time $82,000,000 received over and above the expenses of the Government. The Secretary then is to cancel or to redeem or pay the legal-tender notes by issuing new bonds and disposing of them. Now, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if that is anything more than the change of one debt for another; if it does reduce in any way the public debt?

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator give way to allow me to answer?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly not. That merely exchanges one form of debt for another; but when I have paid my grocer's bill which does not bear interest by giving him my note of hand payable in sixty days, which bears interest, and my grocer is content to take the note, although I owe just as much as I did before, my grocer feels better than he did before; and so I call that the payment of an existing liability. It is really the postponement of it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I say to the honorable Senator that I have tried that a number of times. I have paid one debt which I owed, by giving my note with interest, and I have found after all that that was not payment. I agree that it is an improvement of the condition of the Government; it is a duty which the Government ought to perform. When the Government owes a debt and cannot pay it, it is the most reasonable thing in the world that it should meet its obligations in the best manner possible and that it should give its obligation with a consideration for forbearance, but it is not, in my estimation, a canceling or payment of the debt.

Mr. HOWE. But it is a canceling of the public debt, my friend will allow me to say, in case your revenues enable you to destroy the greenbacks without issuing bonds.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Certainly it is. I only say that there is a contingency in which this bill does not actually provide for the canceling of that amount of money. There is an uncertainty connected with it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator, in response to the Senator from Wisconsin, stated that he had practiced the same himself, in his private affairs, I suppose. I ask him whether or not that practice did not keep up his credit?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Yes; a great deal better than if I had not practiced it, certainly.

Mr. President, there are two or three objects which we have in view. One is to reduce the public debt; another is to reach specie payments. I have supposed, and I suppose still, that there will be no permanent resumption of specie payments until the business of the country comes up to that condition in which the banks can readily meet their obligations as they shall be demanded; but the proposition now is to withdraw from our circulation a proportion of the legal-tender notes, and instead of eighty-two millions to increase the bank currency two hundred and eighteen million dollars. It appears to me that we cannot withdraw that money and put the obligation upon the banks and require them, as we ought to require them, to redeem except it shall be by a severe pressure upon the mercantile and commercial interests of this country. The banks are nothing but for the time being the agents of commerce, and whenever you compel the banks to pay specie you commence to force commercial men to meet their obligations to the same value.

I desire some measure that will relieve us from the embarrassed condition in which we are, and I desire also that there shall be such an act passed as will enable the business interests of the country to receive so much bank currency as their necessities may demand, and I have believed and believe now that if you will by your laws compel the banks to redeem either in legal-tender notes or in specie at their pleasure, and then if you will compel the Government to redeem the legal-tender notes in coin or interest-bearing bonds that will bring par, you will come right up to the very day when currency and coin will be on a level; and I say it is a wrong to this community to postpone that day to 1878. We can meet the obligation according to the desire of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin by giving our note with interest, without waiting till 1878.

Several SENATORS. Question! Question!

Mr. WRIGHT. If we can have a vote I will not say a word. I very much prefer a vote to saying a word on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to refer the subject to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate further insist on its amendments, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Chair state the question exactly?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate further insist upon its amendments and grant the further conference asked by the House of Representatives?

Mr. SHERMAN. On account of the form in which the question is put, I suppose Senators would like to prove some inconsistency on some of us. I shall vote in substance for a conference. As a matter of course my friend from Pennsylvania and I are very decidedly opposed to the proposition that passed the Senate; but we shall vote together for a conference. That is the substance of the thing. The form in which the question is put, I suppose, is in order to deter people voting for a conference who before voted against insisting.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think any such consideration should deter the Senator. On the motion before, which was to insist and ask for a conference, the Senator thought we had better not go any further. I want to call to his mind that the same question arises again, and I trust he will vote with me.

Mr. SHERMAN. The substance of the last vote was to insist on the Senate amendment. Now the substance is whether we shall deny the request of three-fourths of the House of Representatives for a conference.

Mr. SARGENT. Whether we will insist on the Senate amendment and deny, as we tried to deny before, a conference.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to be enlightened as to this fact: whether upon the vote which is now to be taken by the Senate the affirmative will be an approval of the amendments passed by the Senate to this bill. I desire a conference, if that can lead the minds of the two Houses to some measure; but I do not desire by any vote of mine to approve the measure that passed the Senate. I ask this because I desire to know whether the motion can be severed, or whether it is necessary that it should take the shape of an apparent approval of the bill as it passed the Senate. At the same time I desire the conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state, in answer to the Senator's question, that the Chair understands that the substance of this proposition is, will the Senate grant the conference? The technical way of stating it is, "Will the Senate insist and grant the conference?" because the insisting is indispensable to the conference. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. KELLY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] I presume he, if here, would vote in the affirmative, and I would vote in the negative.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Being paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. LEWIS,] and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I shall refrain from voting.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 38, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Conkling, Cooper, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Stewart, Thurman, and Washburn—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Patterson, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Wadleigh—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. WRIGHT, FERRY of Michigan, and STEVENSON were appointed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to take up the resolution reported from the Select Committee on Transportation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves an adjournment.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask to have the resolution taken up before we adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from South Carolina will no doubt agree that the resolution may be taken up so as to be the unfinished business, and then we can adjourn.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do not want it taken up.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the Senate will not adjourn until we take up this resolution. I ask the Senator from South Carolina if there is any objection to taking up this resolution before we adjourn?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have an objection to it.

Mr. SARGENT. We desire to take up the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Then we may as well adjourn.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. My only purpose in calling for the yeas and nays——

Several SENATORS. Order! Order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No debate is allowed on a motion to adjourn. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cooper Gilbert, Hitchcock, McCreery, Merrimon, Robertson, Sargent, and Saulsbury—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—42.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Cameron, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, and Thurman—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. WINDOM. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Select Committee on Transportation.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. WINDOM from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, instructing the Committee on Appropriations to report amendments to the river and harbor bill making appropriations for completing the surveys and estimates for each of the improvements recommended by the select committee upon the four routes indicated in their report.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 13, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation, not to occupy over five minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. GARFIELD. After that I shall ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I only ask the attention of the House for a few minutes while I make an explanation on a matter which is somewhat personal to myself. It is not often that I deem it necessary to call public attention to anything that I may see in a newspaper; but an editorial in a recent number of the New York Tribune has been brought to my notice which I think is of sufficient importance to justify an explanation. Had the speech alluded to in this editorial been delivered in the House where it could have been reported, or if I were satisfied that the writer of the editorial intended a willful misrepresentation, I would not have deemed this course necessary. But it is due to my able and distinguished colleague on the other side of the House [Mr. LAMAR] as well as to myself that I make this explanation, because those who may have heard his very eloquent speech on Monday last and who may have read this editorial will agree with me in the opinion that it did him injustice as well as myself. But, sir, he of course is sufficiently competent to take care of himself. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I have marked in an editorial of the New York Tribune of June 10.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LYNCH spoke of the civil-rights bill, and he was of course not well pleased at the manner in which the House had treated it; but he assured the caucus of the strict party fidelity of the colored people. There was to be no reconciliation between them and their old masters. They would not believe that slavery was beyond revival. They would not trust a southern white man with their liberties. They cared comparatively little for honesty in office—this at least was the general drift of his address; they could pardon fraud, corruption, licentiousness, anything mean or disgraceful, to an orthodox republican politician; and they would sooner vote for a thief like Moses than an upright gentleman like LAMAR. These are the conclusions logically to be drawn from the remarks of Mr. LYNCH, as we collate them from the reports of the various papers; and it will be seen that they are equivalent to a notice to the party that it may nominate any rascal they please, and the southern negroes will swallow him.

Mr. LYNCH. Now, sir, I have not quite such a poor opinion of my colleague as that seems to infer. But the idea I intended to convey upon that occasion and the substance of what I said was simply this: that whatever may be the nature of the reports that have been circulated about some of the Southern States, and whatever may be true of the governments of other States, I know that such unfavorable reports are not true of the State of Mississippi, the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. The idea I intended to convey was this, and I want to impress it upon my friends on the other side of the House, because I regard some of them as my friends personally if not politically, that for the evils complained of in some of the Southern States they themselves are responsible and not the colored people. Sir, it is in consequence of the continued uncompromising, repulsive attitude of the democratic party toward the colored people that they are necessarily compelled on many occasions to vote for men whom they would otherwise vote against. The position of the democratic party toward the colored people has been and is such, that their rights and their privileges to a certain extent are involved in every election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen on the other side of the House will bear this fact in mind, they will agree with me in these conclusions. I want to see the day come when the colored people of this country can afford to occupy an independent position in politics; but that day, in my judgment, will never come so long as there remains a strong, powerful, intelligent, wealthy organization arrayed against them as a race and as a class. That is my judgment. When this state of things shall have passed away, then they will be more independent than they now are.

I ask for a national civil-rights bill full and complete, not only because it is an act of simple justice, but because it will be instrumental in placing the colored people in a more independent position; because it will, in my judgment, be calculated to bring about a friendly feeling between the two races in all sections of the country, and will place the colored people in a position where their identification with any party will be a matter of choice and not of necessity. And while I reiterate the opinion that the great majority of the colored people will remain true to the republican party so long as that party maintains its present friendly attitude towards them, yet I know and believe that all true republicans are ready, willing, and anxious to place the colored people in a position where they can be more independent in the management, government, and control of their local affairs. I will, sir, if the opportunity shall ever present itself, give my views at length upon the important question of civil rights and civil government at the South.

DEMPSEY & O'TOOLE.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2945) for the relief of the late firm of Dempsey & O'Toole, and the accompanying papers, and the same were referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOHN M. M'PIKE.

Mr. KENDALL. I move to suspend the rules to take up and pass the bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, is there not a conference report to be presented at twelve o'clock to-day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] gave notice to that effect last evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire the House to go into the Committee of the Whole as soon as possible on the sundry civil appropriation bill, that we may finish it to-day. But at twelve o'clock I will move that the committee rise, as I do not wish to antagonize a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $19,473.50 to John M. McPike in full settlement for beef and supplies furnished to troops by Jordan & McPike in quelling the Indian disturbances in the Territory of Utah, now the State of Nevada, in 1860.

Mr. KENDALL. I ask to occupy a single minute in explaining this bill. It is a Senate bill. It has been twice considered by a Senate committee. In the last Congress it failed for want of time. At the present session it has been reported unanimously by the Senate Committee on Claims; has been passed by the Senate; and has been considered by the House committee. I suppose I am authorized to state that it has been unanimously recommended by that committee for passage. The reason I present the bill is that I have been requested to do so by a member of that committee. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to make a single inquiry. Why cannot this claim under the existing law be allowed by the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. KENDALL. I will only say that it has not taken that course; and if the bill does not pass the House now the claimant, who has already waited now fourteen years for the payment of this money, may have to wait fourteen years longer.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, it was seconded.

The motion was then agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS obtained the floor.

Mr. TREMAIN. On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, and in pursuance of previous notice, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill relating to southern elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not feel justified in recognizing the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] for business of that kind, which would inevitably detain the House, till the public business is disposed of.

MOIETIES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I desire to ask the House to consider at this time the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs laws and to repeal moieties.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] upon the moieties bill, as a matter of great public importance, as he understands it is the desire of the Committee on Ways and Means to get the bill into the hands of a conference committee as soon as possible.

Mr. GARFIELD. If this bill will not take long I will not waste the time of the House in a contest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope there will be some opportunity for debate on this bill.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. At this period of the session I cannot believe the House desires further debate on the bill. I ask the House to act on the amendments without debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not that require a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. To cut off debate it will be necessary to suspend the rules.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I move to suspend the rules so that the Senate amendments to the moiety bill may be disposed of seriatim, without debate.

The motion to suspend the rules being seconded, was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. If I may be allowed two or three words——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; after you have cut off debate we object, of course, to your being allowed to discuss the bill.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out in the first section of the bill the words: "section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The second amendment was read, as follows:

In the second section insert after the word "forfeitures" the words "under the customs-revenue laws."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The third amendment was read, as follows:

Before the word "fines," in line 7 of section 2, insert the word "such."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The fourth amendment was read, as follows:

In section 3, after the word "otherwise," in line 5, insert the following:

And for the purpose of making such compensation for the next fiscal year, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

The fifth and sixth amendments were to insert "that" at the beginning of section 4, and also to insert the word "duties" before the words "costs and charges;" so as to make the first clause of the section read as follows:

That whenever any officer of the customs or other person shall detect and seize goods, wares, or merchandise, in the act of being smuggled, or which have been smuggled, he shall be entitled to such compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Treasury shall award, not exceeding in amount one-half of the net proceeds, if any, resulting from such seizure, after deducting all duties, costs, and charges connected therewith.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend concurrence in these amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

The seventh amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out after "custom-house," in line 13 of section 4, the words "or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination;" so that the first clause of the proviso will read as follows:

Provided, That for the purposes of this act smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the custom-house.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The eighth amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 5. That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail or refuse to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure or refusal to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And the said attorney shall be permitted to make examination of the entries referred to in said notice, at which examination the defendant or claimant or his agent may be present, of said book, invoice, or paper, if produced, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have, subject to the order of the court, the custody of them, except pending their examination in court as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in the amendment.

The question being taken on concurring, there were—ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The ninth, eleventh, fourteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, twenty-ninth, thirty-second, thirty-third, thirty-seventh, and thirty-ninth amendments, relating only to changes in the numbering of the sections, were non-concurred in.

The tenth amendment:

Strike out "furnishing information" and insert in lieu thereof "claiming as informer;" so it will read:

That no payment shall be made to any person claiming as informer in any case wherein judicial proceedings shall have been instituted, unless his claim to compensation shall have been established, &c.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a vote on that amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 73.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was non-concurred in.

The twelfth amendment:

In section 11 insert the words "or any other" before the word "act."

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The thirteenth amendment:

Strike out the word "perpetual."

The committee recommended concurrence with an amendment, as follows:

Before the word "a," in line 17, page 6, of the bill, insert the words "at any time;" so it will read "shall have at any time a right of action against such officer or other person," &c.

The amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The fifteenth amendment:

Strike out the words "interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under the customs-revenue laws of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof "claiming compensation under any provision of this act;" so it will read:

That no officer, or other person entitled to or claiming compensation under any provision of this act shall be thereby disqualified from becoming a witness in any action, suit, &c.

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The sixteenth and seventeenth amendments:

Strike out the words "Provided, That in every such case, whenever the officer or person entitled to any share in the fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall appear as a witness," and insert "and in every such case;" and after the word "may" insert the words "appear and;" so it will read:

And in every such case the defendant or defendants may appear and testify and be examined and cross-examined in like manner.

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendments were concurred in.

The twenty-second amendment:

In section 21 strike out "severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by a joint or several actions in any district or circuit court of the United States," and in lieu thereof insert the words "for each offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both."

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-third amendment:

Strike out the words "as aforesaid."

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The twenty-fourth amendment:

In section 21 strike out "liable to forfeiture, which forfeiture shall apply only to the particular item of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates," and in lieu thereof insert "forfeited; which forfeiture shall only apply to the whole of the merchandise in the case or package containing the particular article or articles of merchandise to which such fraud or alleged fraud relates; and anything contained in any act which provides for the forfeiture or confiscation of an entire invoice in consequence of any item or items contained in the same being undervalued, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-sixth amendment:

Strike out the following:

But nothing herein contained shall prevent any owner or claimant from obtaining a release of such merchandise on giving a bond, with sureties satisfactory to the collector, or, in case of judicial proceedings, satisfactory to the court, for the payment of any fine or fines so incurred: Provided, however, That such merchandise shall in no case be released until all accrued duties thereon shall have been paid or secured.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-eighth amendment:

In section 27 insert "in the absence of protest," so it will read "which price or amount shall, in the absence of protest, be conclusive."

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The thirtieth amendment:

Page 11, line 4, insert "collector of the district, whose duty it shall be promptly to report the same to the," so it will read "upon detection of any violation of the customs laws, forthwith to make complaint thereof to the collector of the district, whose duty it shall be promptly to report the same to the district attorney of the district in which such frauds shall be committed."

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The thirty first amendment:

Strike out the following section:

SEC. 10. That in all actions, suits, and proceedings in any court of the United States, now pending or hereafter commenced or prosecuted to enforce or declare the forfeiture of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to recover the value thereof, or any other sum alleged to be forfeited by reason of any violation of the provisions of the customs-revenue laws, or any of such provisions, in which action, suit, or proceeding an issue or issues of fact shall be joined, it shall be the duty of the court, on the trial thereof, to submit to the jury, as a distinct and separate proposition, whether the alleged acts were done with an actual intention to defraud the United States, and to require upon such proposition a special finding by such jury; or, if such issues be tried by the court without a jury, it shall be the duty of the court to pass upon and decide such proposition as a distinct and separate finding of fact; and in such cases, unless intent to defraud shall be so found, no fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall be imposed.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirty-fifth amendment:

Strike out the following section:

SEC. 17. That it shall not be lawful for any officer of customs, special agent, or district attorney to compromise or settle any claim of the United States arising under the customs laws, or relieve from any fine, penalty, or forfeiture; and any officer or person who shall so compromise or settle any such claim, or attempt to make such compromise or settlement, or relieve or attempt to relieve from such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall suffer imprisonment not exceeding ten years and be fined not exceeding $10,000: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with general regulations, to be prescribed by him, not in conflict with existing laws nor with the provisions of this act, may remit any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, upon sufficient proof that there was no intention of fraud or willful neglect upon the part of such person or persons against whom such fines, penalties, or forfeitures shall have accrued, or on the part of his or their agent or agents.

The committee recommended concurrence in the thirty-fifth amendment of the Senate, with an amendment as follows:

Insert in lieu of the section stricken out the following:

SEC. —. That it shall not be lawful for any officer or officers of the United States to compromise or abate any claim of the United States arising under the customs laws for any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred by a violation thereof; and any officer or person who shall so compromise or abate any such claim, or attempt to make such compromise or abatement, or in any manner relieve or attempt to relieve from such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall suffer imprisonment not exceeding ten years, and be fined not exceeding $10,000: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with general regulations, to be prescribed by him, not in conflict with existing laws nor with the provisions of this act, may remit any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, upon sufficient proof that there was no fraudulent intention or willful neglect upon the part of such person or persons against whom such fines, penalties, or forfeitures shall have accrued, or on the part of his or their agent or agents.

The amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Thirth-sixth amendment:

Strike out the following section:

SEC. 18. That whenever any application shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury for the mitigation or remission of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, or the refund of any duties, in case the amount involved is not less than $1,000, the applicant shall notify the district attorney and the collector of customs of the district in which the duties, fine, penalty, or forfeiture accrued; and it shall be the duty of such collector and district attorney to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury all practicable information necessary to enable him to protect the interests of the United States.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirty-eighth amendment:

Insert "after the expiration of three years from the time of entry;" so it will read:

That whenever any goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been entered and passed free of duty, and whenever duties upon any imported goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been liquidated and paid, and such goods, wares, and merchandise shall have been delivered to the owner, importer, agent, or consignee, such entry and passage free of duty and such settlement of duties shall, after the expiration of three years from the time of entry, in the absence of fraud and in the absence of protest by the owner, importer, agent, or consignee, be final and conclusive upon all parties.

The committee recommended concurrence with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

The amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The fortieth, forty-first, forty-second, and forty-third amendments:

Strike out "maintained" and insert "instituted;" strike out "two" and insert "three;" strike out "any legal disability of the person or his" and insert "the;" and insert "of the person subject to such penalty or forfeiture;" so it will read:

SEC. 39. That no suit or action to recover any pecuniary penalty or forfeiture of property accruing under the customs-revenue laws of the United States shall be instituted unless such suit or action shall be commenced within three years after the time when such penalty or forfeiture shall have accrued: Provided, That the time of the absence from the United States of the person subject to such penalty or forfeiture, or of any concealment or absence of the property, shall not be reckoned within this period of limitation.

The committee recommended concurrence.

The amendments were concurred in.

Forty-fourth amendment:

Insert the following new section:

SEC. 20. That in lieu of the salaries, moieties, and perquisites of whatever name or nature, and commissions on disbursements, now paid to and received by collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and other officers and employés connected with the customs service in the several collections districts of the United States hereinafter named, there shall be paid, from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, an annual salary, as follows:

To the collector of the district of New York, $12,000.

To the collectors of the districts of Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts; and San Francisco, California, each $8,000.

To the naval officer for the district of New York, $8,000.

To the naval officers of the districts of Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts; and San Francisco, California, each $5,000.

To the surveyor of the port of New York, $8,000.

To the surveyors of the ports of Boston, Massachusetts; and San Francisco, California, each $5,000.

To the appraiser and other officers and employés in his department in the port of New York, as follows:

To the appraiser, $8,000.

To the assistant appraisers, each $4,000.

To the examiners, each not to exceed $3,000.

To the clerks who may be designated chief clerks, each not to exceed $2,500.

To clerks, verifiers, and samplers, each not to exceed $2,500.

To messengers, each $900.

To openers and packers, each three dollars per diem.

The collector at New York shall detail a store-keeper and such number of clerks and other employés as may, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be deemed necessary to perform the duty of receiving packages designated for examination at the public stores, and of delivering the same, after examination, therefrom; and that all supplies shall be furnished by the collector on monthly estimates submitted by the appraiser to the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved by him, and all repairs and alterations needed in the public store and appraiser's department at said port of New York shall be made in like manner on the recommendation of the appraiser.

There shall be paid to the subordinate officers of the district of New York:

To the assistant collector, $5,000 per annum.

To the deputy collectors, each $4,000 per annum.

To the chief clerk of each division under a deputy collector, $2,500 per annum.

To the entry and liquidating clerks in the office of the collector of customs, each not to exceed $2,500 per annum; and the annual compensation of other collectors, surveyors, and other officers and employés connected with the customs service not named herein, and not herein otherwise provided for, shall continue as fixed by existing law.

The committee recommended concurrence with the following amendment:

Strike out all of the section after the words "to the surveyor of the port of New York, $8,000."

Mr. O'NEILL. I move the following amendment:

That the salaries and compensation of all the officers of customs of the ports of Philadelphia and Baltimore shall be increased so as to be the same amount as the customs officers of the port of Boston as proposed by this bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 28.

So Mr. O'NEILL's amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. BECK. I move now that the amendment of the Senate be non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The question will be on concurrence.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 80.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Forty-fifth amendment:

Insert the following as an additional section:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, make such regulations as he may deem necessary for the conduct and management of the bonded warehouses, general-order stores, and other depositories of the imported merchandise throughout the United States; all regulations or orders issued by collectors of customs in regard thereto shall be subject to revision, alteration, or revocation by him; and no warehouse shall be bonded and no general-order store established without his authority and approval. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in granting permits to establish general-order warehouses, to require such warehouse or warehouses to be located contiguous, or as near as may be, to the landing-places of steamers and vessels from foreign ports; and that no officer of the customs shall have any personal ownership of or interest in any bonded warehouse or general-order store.

The committee recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Forty-sixth amendment:

Insert the following as a new section:

That public cartage of merchandise in the custody of the Government shall be subject to the regulations and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "subject to the regulations and approval" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "let, with not less than ten days' notice of such letting, to the lowest responsible bidder, giving sufficient security, and shall be subject to the regulation and approval;" so it will read:

That public cartage of merchandise in the custody of the Government shall be let, with not less than ten days' notice of such letting, to the lowest responsible bidder, giving sufficient security, and shall be subject to the regulations and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Forty-seventh amendment:

Insert the following as a new section:

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; that nothing herein contained shall affect existing rights, or prevent a distribution, in like manner as if this act had not been passed, in all cases where prosecution has been actually commenced previous to May 1, 1874, or in anywise affect suits or actions commenced for forfeitures incurred previous to May 1, 1874.

The committee recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. CONGER demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes not counted.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS also moved for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, Mr. SHELDON, and Mr. WOOD.

BIGLER, YOUNG & CO.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of Bigler, Young & Co., and that the bill be now put upon its passage. I desire to state that this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims in the Senate, that it unanimously passed the Senate, and has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Claims of the House. The gentlemen for whose relief the bill has been introduced are of the highest character and would not ask anything from Congress that was not right.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of Bigler, Young & Co., of Pennsylvania, for the erection of the light-house at Love Point, in the Chesapeake Bay, on principles of equity and justice; provided that the amount allowed them shall not exceed the sum of $1,694.55; and appropriates such sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purpose.

There being no objection, the Committee on Claims were discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPEER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CURRENCY AND FREE BANKING.

Mr. MAYNARD. Pursuant to notice given yesterday, I rise to present the report of the conference committee on the currency bill.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment after "that," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,' approved June 3, 1864, shall be hereafter known as "the national-bank act."

SEC. 2. That section 31 of "the national-bank act" be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits in all respects, as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said acts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the proviso in the first section of the act approved July 12, 1870, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," prohibiting the banks hereafter organized a circulation over $500,000; and the proviso in the third section of said act limiting the circulation of banks authorized to issue notes redeemable in gold coin to $1,000,000; and section 6 of said act, relating to the redistribution of twenty-five millions of circulating notes, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; that every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by "the national-bank act."

SEC. 4. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of such circulation; which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve, as provided in section 2 of this act; and when the circulating notes of any such associations, assorted or unassorted, shall be presented for redemption, in sums of $1,000, or any multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally, on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; and whenever such redemptions for any association shall amount to the sum of $500, such association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And all notes of national banks worn, defaced, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation shall, when received by any assistant treasurer or at any designated depository of the United States, be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption as provided herein. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed shall be forwarded to the respective associations by which they were issued; but if any of such notes are worn, mutilated, defaced, or rendered otherwise unfit for use, they shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed and replaced as now provided by law: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the charges for transportation, and the costs for assorting such notes; and the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the cost of engraving such plates as shall be ordered by each association respectively; and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer: And provided further, That so much of section 32 of said national-bank act requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this section, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes; which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

SEC. 6. That the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, cause the charter numbers of the association to be printed upon all national-bank notes which may be hereafter issued by him.

SEC. 7. That the entire amount of United States notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, which shall be retired and reduced in the following manner only, to wit: within thirty days after circulating notes to the amount of $1,000,000 shall, from time to time, be issued to national banking associations under this act, in excess of the highest outstanding volume thereof at any time prior to such issue, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retire an amount of United States notes equal to three-eighths of the circulating notes so issued, which shall be in reduction of the maximum amount of $382,000,000 fixed by this section; and such reduction shall continue until the maximum amount of United States notes outstanding shall be $300,000,000; and the United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of the act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund. And the interest thereon, computed at the rate of 5 per cent., shall be added to said sinking fund. But if the surplus revenue be not sufficient for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

SEC. 8. That on and after the 1st day of January, 1878, any holder of United States notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof, may present them for payment at the office of the Treasurer of the United States, or at the office of the assistant treasurer at the city of New York; and thereupon he shall be entitled to receive, at his option, from the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized and required to issue, in exchange for said notes, an equal amount of either class of the coupon or registered bonds of the United States provided for in the first section of the act approved on the 14th of July, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the act amendatory thereof, approved the 20th day of January, 1871, which bonds shall continue to be exempt from taxation as provided in said act: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of such bonds, may redeem said notes in the gold coin of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reissue the United States notes so received either in exchange for coin at par, or, with the consent of the holder, in the redemption of bonds then redeemable at par, or in the purchase of bonds at not less than par, or to meet the current payments for the public service; and when used to meet current payments an equal amount of the gold in the Treasury shall be applied in redemption of the bonds known as five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize any increase of the principal of the public debt of the United States.

And the Senate agree to the same.

HORACE MAYNARD,
C. B. FARWELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
O. P. MORTON,
JOHN SHERMAN,
A. S. MERRIMON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. It will be seen from the reading of the report that the conference committee have made a recommendation in form substantially the same that was made the other day from the Committee on Banking and Currency; that is, to concur in the Senate amendment to the bill of the House with an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill. I desire to call the attention of the House to the changes made from the report submitted the other day by the Committee on Banking and Currency. The two changes of any considerable importance between the report then submitted by the Committee on Banking and Currency and the present report are these:

That report recommended that as national-bank notes were issued greenbacks should be retired pro rata at the rate of 40 per cent. The Senate bill sent over to us made it 25 per cent. This report fixes the ratio of retiring at three-eighths or 37½ per cent. That is a concession looking in one direction.

The bill, as it came back to us from the Senate and as reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, fixed the 1st day of July, 1878, in the eighth section of the bill, as the time when redemption should begin. This report fixes it six months earlier, on the 1st day of January, 1878, which is a concession in the other direction.

These two modifications are the principal ones made by the committee of conference from the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency. There are several others, but they are in their character verbal or explanatory only.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to call the attention of my colleague to a portion of section 7 of the conference bill, as follows:

The United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of the act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund. And the interest thereon, computed at the rate of 5 per cent., shall be added annually to said sinking fund. But if the surplus revenue be not sufficient for this purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled,

Will my colleague please explain the meaning of that clause of the conference report? Is it meant that these notes shall constitute a part of the sinking fund, and that they shall bear interest in the same way that the sinking fund now bears interest? And is it contemplated that in the appropriations or estimates for the sinking fund that interest to the amount of the eighty-two millions shall be computed and added to that account?

Mr. MAYNARD. If my colleague will look at the form of the bill as it came from the Senate, he will find in reference to the retiring of the legal-tender notes this provision:

And for that purpose he is authorized to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States of the character and description prescribed in this act for United States notes to be then retired and canceled.

The Committee on Banking and Currency, instead of that, recommended this provision:

And the United States notes so retired shall be canceled and carried to the account of the sinking fund provided for by the second clause of section 5 of the act approved on the 25th of February, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption and funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," and shall constitute a portion of said sinking fund.

These two provisions are incorporated into the conference report in this manner: That if the requirements of the sinking fund, the requirements of the Government to keep up the sinking fund, should prove adequate for the use of all these notes, so to be retired, they are to take that direction. If not, then the Secretary is authorized to make an issue of bonds of the description subsequently prescribed, that is to say, the bonds that are created by the act of 14th July, 1870, and use them for that purpose.

Now, my colleague will observe that the sinking fund created by the act of February 25, 1862, was not commenced during the war, nor indeed until the year 1869. The original act creating the sinking fund provided that 1 per cent. a year should be carried to it—1 per cent. of the entire public debt; and that that fund with the annually accruing interest upon it shall be a perpetual fund for the liquidation of the public debt. The first year when the sinking fund was kept as a separate fund there were $7,000,000 according to my computation accrued to it; the next year $27,000,000; the next year $29,000,000; the next year $30,000,000; the next year, the year ending June 30, 1873, there were also $30,000,000; making the full amount funded to that date, as shown by the books of the Treasury Department, $123,000,000. If the sinking fund for the current year were kept up according to the original intention of the act there would be added 1 per cent. of the outstanding debt, together with the interest on the fund already accrued, making together somewhere about $29,000,000.

Now, the object of this provision is that, instead of these interest-bearing bonds being put into the sinking fund, greenbacks shall be placed there, and for the purpose of keeping up the fund according to the original scheme and intention the interest shall be computed on them as though they were bonds.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not the bill require that the greenbacks carried to the fund shall be canceled?

Mr. MAYNARD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What advantage is that? The old bonds were canceled. Suppose that we repeal next year their legal-tender character?

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, you can make any supposition you please looking to violating the faith of the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, pardon me; that would not be violating the faith of the Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. Perhaps if we have a purpose to do so we may refuse to pay the public debt of any kind, or to pay any interest on the outstanding debt. We may suppose almost anything else if we once suppose that we are going to violate the public faith.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But a repeal of the legal-tender clause is not a violation of the public faith. Did not the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency enunciate that doctrine, that the repeal of the legal-tender law would be no violation of the public faith?

Mr. COX. The President says it ought to be done.

Mr. SPEER. Yes; in his memorandum.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thought I was enunciating a proposition that would be so obvious that it would not be called in question by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but if he questions it, I really have not time to debate it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was only asking your opinion about it.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order. The confusion is so great that we cannot hear a word of this colloquy which is going on.

The SPEAKER. The House must be in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. To avoid circumlocution upon this question I ask my colleague if it is intended by this clause of the report of the committee of conference to cancel and retire legal-tender notes as a part of the sinking fund?

Mr. MAYNARD. Only for the purpose of computation in keeping up the sinking fund according to its original scheme and plan.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I do not understand what is the meaning of the subsequent clause that provides for their sale in certain contingencies.

Mr. MAYNARD. My associate on the committee of conference, who dissents from the report, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] has expressed a desire to address the House.

Mr. CLYMER. For a very short time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Does he believe that it will be practicable for us to resume payments in specie on the 1st of January, 1878, and if so, where will the specie come from?

Mr. MAYNARD. It will be practicable to redeem our bonds, if not in specie, at least to redeem them as contemplated here, by the issuance of one class of the bonds of 1870.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And of what advantage will that be to the public at large? It will put a non-interest-bearing debt on interest.

Mr. MAYNARD. The advantage will be this, that it will allow the holders of legal-tender notes who may happen to have notes for which they have no immediate use to convert them into interest-bearing bonds at a comparatively low rate of interest, and then authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue those very notes for the purpose of calling in outstanding bonds due bearing a higher rate of interest. If this proposed bill becomes a law, the effect will be in a very few years to refund the entire public debt at a lower rate of interest, and that without any additional expense.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is there not danger that it will be followed by a rapid contraction of the currency? Would not $50,000,000 of greenbacks rush in to be converted into bonds, and endanger the whole business interests of the country?

Mr. MAYNARD. Why, not at all.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I introduced a bill at an early day in the session which I think is worthy of consideration.

The bill referred to by Mr. LAWRENCE is as follows:

A bill to facilitate the resumption of specie payments, and to prevent fluctuations in the value of United States notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That after the passage of this act the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on the importation of the articles mentioned in the schedule hereto annexed shall be increased 10 per cent.; and a like increase of 10 per cent. in the rate of duties to be levied, collected, and paid shall be made every six months thereafter until the existing rate of duties shall be increased 100 per cent.; and the duties on all such articles shall be paid only in gold coin or bullion imported from some foreign country with such articles and not exported from the United States to be imported for that purpose.

SEC. 2. That from the duties hereafter collected from any articles imported, there shall be retained in the Treasury, in addition to the amount in the Treasury on the 15th day of July, 1874, not including special deposits held for redemption of certificates of deposit, $2,000,000 each month, which shall not be sold or paid out until otherwise provided by law after the sum in the Treasury shall have reached $400,000,000, exclusive of special deposits, except only that the same may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the purchase of United States notes as hereafter provided.

SEC. 3. That whenever the market price of United States notes in New York City shall reach less than eighty-seven dollars in gold coin for one hundred dollars in United States notes, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, purchase such amounts of such notes as he may deem proper at a rate not exceeding 87 per cent. of the par value thereof at any time after July 15, 1874, and at an advance of 1 per cent. on and after the 15th day of July of each year thereafter until the price shall reach the par value of United States notes. And for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury shall first use any gold coin or bullion in the Treasury over and above the amount required by section 2 of this act to be kept in the Treasury, and may, if necessary, borrow on the faith and credit of the United States a sum not exceeding $50,000,000 for an equal amount of gold coin or bullion, and may issue therefor registered or coupon bonds redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, which shall bear interest in gold coin at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, be in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and be entitled to all exemptions of other United States bonds. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall not retain in the Treasury the United States notes so purchased any longer than he uses the same to the advantage of the United States in the purchase of outstanding bonds of the United States, so that said notes shall be kept in circulation; or, if the Secretary of the Treasury deem it expedient temporarily to use any other gold coin or bullion in the Treasury, he shall be and is authorized to do so, and to replace the same as soon as practicable.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe and enforce rules and regulations necessary or proper to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SCHEDULE OF ARTICLES REFERRED TO IN SECTION 1 OF THE FOREGOING ACT.

Beer, ale, porter, and other malt liquors.
Brandy, wines, liqueurs, arrack, and all spirituous beverages.
Silk, and manufactures thereof, in whole or in part.
Diamonds and gems, real and imitation.
Embroideries of cotton, silk, or wool, or other material.
Fancy articles and perfumery.
Furs, and manufactures thereof.
Jet, and manufactures thereof.
Jewelry, real or imitation.
Paintings and statuary.
Velvets.
Tobacco, and manufactures thereof.
Carpets and carpetings of all kinds.
Broadcloths.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLYMER. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HEREFORD. I only wish to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. MAYNARD. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish it understood that I do not yield the floor except temporarily to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLYMER. I so understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee retains possession of the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. As by your appointment, Mr. Speaker, I was made a member of the conference committee on the currency question, whose report is now under consideration, I ask the privilege to state very briefly the reasons which controlled me in declining to sign it.

I entered on the discharge of my duties guided by a simple and axiomatic financial faith, which is that money is the standard of value—that under the Constitution, under the teachings of the fathers, under Jefferson, Jackson, Clay, Webster, and Benton, there is but one standard—gold and silver; that with us as a nation, and with all other nations of the earth, Christian and heathen, these two metals are the only standard or measure of value, and that they are the only things which can be called money, save by misnomer or cheat. I also know that for the purposes of convenience and of trade we have a medium of exchange called currency, and that its most usual form was a slip of paper called a bank note, although it may have others, such as checks, promissory notes, bills of exchange, drafts, &c., all, however, evidences of credit which is based on value, that is gold or silver which are its standard or measure.

These things I thought I knew, certainly I believe them, and therefore, sir, it is not surprising that believing them to-day I have been unable to agree with the majority of the committee in their conclusions.

It will not be pretended by any one that these conclusions, as expressed in the bill under consideration, are those which would have been proposed and adopted by the majority of this House when we first met in December last, or which are now demanded by the wants and exigencies of the times. For weary months we have talked and talked, and shown most effectually "how not to do it" and now that we are about "to do it," and it is done, I venture to predict that every man who has had part or lot in it will be heartily ashamed of his work before another year is past. It is a transparent effort to escape condemnation and to bridge over the coming elections. Never, sir, in the history of any nation has a great party, enthroned in every department of the government, with the Executive and more than two-thirds in both branches of the Legislature, stood so utterly powerless and helpless before a whole people, who had a right to demand wise and beneficent legislation! They indeed asked for bread, and you propose in scorn, and utter disregard, to offer them a stone.

What does this bill mean? First and chiefly, indeed I had almost said only, to fasten on the nation a banking system, whose benefits are exclusively for the rich and the few, by which absolutely and forever the industry, the labor, the enterprise of the whole land is to be mortgaged to the money-lending interest of the nation. The banking interest is to be enlarged, extended and forever perpetuated; it is to be erected into a great league or guild, sustained and defended by all the powers of the Federal Government, covering every State, infesting every locality; its power permeating every transaction of business and controlling every election, State and national, and to become a hundred-fold more dangerous to the rights and liberties of the people than was ever the Bank of the United States in its days of greatest power. Jackson made himself immortal by destroying the latter. There will be even greater glory for him who may free the land of the former.

It is not to be denied that the existing national banking system is purely an outgrowth of the necessities of the times through which we have lately passed; that it was an expedient temporary in its nature, to be changed when the nation resumed its normal condition; but by this bill it is designed to make it general and perpetual, and in order to wipe out every trace of that which marked it as temporary, it is called the "national-bank act."

The law authorizing the issue of a national Government currency, including the legal-tender clause, though of doubtful expediency and still more doubtful constitutionality, was accepted and submitted to, by reason of the necessities of the hour which gave it birth; but it had its benefits, the people became reconciled to it, the court of last resort determined its constitutionality, and by custom, sanctioned by law, it has become the basis of the whole business of the country. And, sir, ever since the crash in September, in the midst of the demand for some measure of relief from the distress and stagnation which everywhere prevail, who has ever heard from any quarter complaint about this currency?

It is true that the people have asked that such measures should be adopted by us as would provide for its redemption in specie, in order that it might have actual, real, permanent value; but instead of that my colleagues of the conference committee, in the plenitude of their wisdom, and I say it not disrespectfully, although complainingly, design by this bill to retire and destroy it, although it costs the Government or the tax-payers not a farthing to keep it afloat, in order that room may be made for the increased and increasing circulation of the national banks, which costs the tax-payers 6 per cent. on all the bonds deposited to secure it. Even now this amounts to twenty-four millions a year, and when all the greenbacks are retired and funded, this amount will be increased twofold if their place is to be supplied by national-bank currency. What the limit of this process of fraud and robbery may be I am not now prepared to say, but unquestionably under this bill it may go on until the whole existing indebtedness of the Government becomes the basis of this system of dishonesty and ultimate ruin. I do not claim that this will be done; I only assert its possibility under this bill. The self-interest, the cupidity of the moneyed interest, may restrain and regulate it, it may become "a law unto itself;" for surely other than this there is no limit, no restraint.

My colleagues were not, however, quite subservient enough to executive dictation to destroy the Government currency or greenbacks at a blow, and thus impose additional taxes to be paid in gold, as they were required to do by the recent pronunciamiento from the White House, but they have not failed to take a step in that direction in obedience to the last and most emphatic manifestation of executive will!

What the people demanded was that the laws should be so framed and the resources of the country so husbanded that the greenback currency should be made equal to gold, and the holder of them should be thereby placed upon a footing with the speculating bondholders, the men who sold their gold at enormous rates in the hour of our country's direst need, invested the proceeds in its securities, and called it "lending to the Government!" and not content with this speculation, required Congress subsequently to change the contract, thereby enhancing the value of the bonds, while the laborer was called on to pay the additional taxation necessary for the purpose, while he in his squalor and impotency must rest content with the ever-present curse of an irredeemable paper currency which increases nearly twice the cost of everything he eats, drinks, and wears, making him, and his children after him, the pack-horse and slaves of a system conceived in necessity and continued in fraud.

But, sir, it is painfully evident that the majority in this Congress will do nothing in the true interests of labor or of the people generally. They stubbornly refuse to provide to pay the greenback in gold, but propose to retire and substitute a national-bank currency for eighty-two million of them, and to fund and redeem the remaining three hundred millions by the issue of gold interest-bearing bonds, for the interest on which the people must be taxed, thus continuing a practice which under republican rule has prevailed for years, for the benefit and enrichment of capital, to the prejudice and impoverishment of labor, and to secure the final and perpetual ascendency of the moneyed aristocracy. When the greenback is exterminated, as it must and will ultimately be by this bill if it becomes a law, then the universal and absolute domination of the national banks will begin. They will, by it, have the exclusive franchise to furnish this entire country for all time with all its currency, and on every bond pledged to secure it the interest must be paid to them in gold raised by taxation from the people.

Sir, taxation is the "shibboleth" of the party in power, it is the "Alpha and Omega" of their creed. By it the national-bank system is upheld and supported; by it labor is burdened and oppressed; by it extravagance and waste are maintained in every department of the Government; by the means of it presidential and other salaries are increased and the products of industry and labor are decreased; and by it the ruling dynasty defies the will and mocks at the necessities of the people.

In 1860 the expenses of the Government, exclusive of interest on the public debt and pensions, were $58,956,952.39. In 1874 the expenses of the Government, exclusive of interest on the public debt and pensions, were $167,440,297.38. Yet this bill proposes still greater taxation for the benefit of a class who of all others are least entitled to legislative favor or protection, and it is to be passed by a party whose chief rallying-cry is "protection to labor." Well may labor everywhere, in the shop, the field, the mine, exclaim, "Save me from my friends!"

I assert, sir, that it was within the power of the majority in this Congress to have conferred lasting fame upon themselves and enduring benefits upon labor, to have lighted the fires in every furnace and forge, to have started the wheels of industry in every shop and mill, to have fostered and promoted the building of thousands of miles of iron highway, and to have caused every sea to be whitened with the sails of our ships, bearing our productions to other lands, had they heeded the just demands of the people. But to them the opportunity has been lost, and they must give way to those who will be equal to the emergency.

A wise, honest, statesman-like policy would have done it; but in its stead a most oppressive and destructive one is to be adopted. Had the means been taken to bring the Government currency or greenback to a gold standard by some gradual, sure, but not oppressive process, which could easily have been done, and had the banking interest and its aggressive power been restrained instead of enlarged, some of their violated pledges would have been redeemed, and the grateful thanks of the laboring and business men of the country would have been justly theirs. I, sir, am unwilling to share the blame attaching to their incompetency and dereliction of duty by signing the report of the conference, nor will I fasten further bondage, disgrace, and misery upon the country by voting for it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have a word or two to say.

Mr. KELLOGG. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well; I will let the gentleman ask a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat, and who I understand is in favor of gold and silver and against national-bank notes and also in favor of greenbacks, how he is going to redeem greenbacks in gold and silver unless the national-bank note circulation is increased and the present volume of greenbacks is diminished?

Mr. CLYMER. Give me the power and time and I will do it.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is the only question I wanted to ask. He does not answer——

Mr. MAYNARD. Before calling the previous question I wish to say that my associate on the committee of conference, [Mr. CLYMER,] has given quite a satisfactory reason why he should not sign the report. But, from the names attached to the report, I am satisfied that it is not to be a party question, using the word "party" with reference to the two great political parties of the country. There are names of gentlemen attached to this report who are as decided in their democracy as any member of the committee can be as a republican. Therefore, having got out of the area of politics——

Mr. COX. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I cannot yield.

Mr. COX. Does this bill contract or expand the currency?

Mr. MAYNARD. I was about to remark that I regret the absence of the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania from this report, because it might seem to give a sectional character to this question of currency, and make the division upon the question of sectional lines, which I should very much regret. But I am very sure the vote of the House will obliterate any such line, if any one thinks it exists. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded upon a division—ayes 116, noes 31—and the main question was then ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COX and Mr. SPEER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Two or three gentlemen have asked the Chair privately to state the effect of this vote. The question is, Will the House agree to the report of the committee of conference? An affirmative vote on that question passes the bill as reported from the committee of conference.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But a negative vote does not necessarily defeat the bill.

The SPEAKER. A negative vote leaves the report of the committee of conference not agreed to. What subsequent proceedings may be had of course the Chair knows nothing about.

Mr. COX. There can be a new committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. If the two Houses order it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 146, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Cotton, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Dobbins, Dunnell, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Garfield, Hagans, Harrison, John B. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Howe, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kasson, Lamport, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Negley, Orr, Packard, Packer, Parsons, Pelham, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, and Woodworth—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Coburn, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Danford, Davis, Dawes, Donnan, Durham, Eames, Eden, Frye, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Hoskins, Hunton, Hyde, Jewett, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lawrence, Lawson, Leach, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Moore, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Randall, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sloan, Small, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standiford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Swann, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Wallace, Walls, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, and John D. Young—146.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barry, Clayton, Crocker, DeWitt, Duell, Eldredge, Elliott, Field, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hersey, Holman, Houghton, Hubbell, Killinger, MacDougall, McJunkin, Mitchell, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Sheldon, Sloss, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Taylor, Townsend, Waddell, Wilber, John M. S. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Pierce M. B. Young—35.

So the report of the committee of conference was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. NIBLACK. My colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, is detained at home by sickness in his family; if here he would vote "no."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. KILLINGER; if here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. CROCKER, is absent; if here he would vote "no." I told him that if I came to the conclusion to vote for this report I would pair with him; but I vote the same way that he would.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I am paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan, who would vote "ay" if here, and I would vote "no."

Mr. MCDILL, of Wisconsin. My colleague, Mr. G. W. HAZELTON, is necessarily absent; if here he would vote "ay."

Mr. BELL. My colleague, Mr. P. M. B. YOUNG, is absent at West Point as one of the examiners on the part of the House. If here, he would vote "no."

Mr. O'BRIEN. My colleague, Mr. E. K. WILSON, is detained at home by sickness in his family. If here, he would vote "no."

Mr. NEGLEY. Respecting the views of my constituents, I vote "ay." Personally I am opposed to several provisions of this report.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS, [to Mr. CLYMER.] Withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the effect of this motion. If adopted, it would merely prevent the vote just taken from being reconsidered. It would not prevent action of the House with a view to a new conference. It would merely declare with emphasis that this particular vote shall not be taken over again.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In what way can a new conference be obtained—by what motion?

The SPEAKER. By a mere motion in the words the gentleman has just used. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has indicated his purpose to make such a motion.

Mr. CLYMER. I insist on my motion to reconsider and lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moves that the House ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. This motion takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.] Any motion tending to bring the two Houses together has precedence over a motion that merely relates to the one body.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DAWES, there were—ayes 101, noes 39.

Mr. POTTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will a new conference give us a new committee?

The SPEAKER. The adoption of the motion in the present form would be construed by the Chair as an instruction by the House for the appointment of a new committee.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 197, nays 48, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barry, Cain, Clayton, Crocker, Darrall, DeWitt, Duell, Eldredge, Elliott, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Herndon, Hersey, Holman, Hooper, Houghton, Hubbell, Killinger, Lamison, Lofland, MacDougall, McLean, Mitchell, Morey, Myers, Pelham, Purman, Robbins, William R. Roberts, William A. Smith, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Taylor, Waddell, Wheeler, Wilber, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Pierce M. B. Young—44.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. TOWNSEND. My colleague, Mr. KILLINGER, who is absent, would if present vote "ay."

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Upon the main question with reference to this bill I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HUBBELL. Upon this question, if present, he would vote "ay," and I should also vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CLYMER. I now ask that the question be taken on my motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was rejected.

The SPEAKER. That subject is scarcely before the House. Pro forma the motion to reconsider may be regarded as laid on the table; it does not affect the question.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CLYMER to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. DAWES, Mr. MCCRARY, and Mr. MARSHALL as the conferees on the part of the House.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill all debate on the pending paragraph be limited to ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to submit a report from the Judiciary Committee upon the relations of the General Government and the District of Columbia. The report was submitted some time ago, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted. I have now the unanimous authority of the committee (who have given careful attention to the subject) to submit this report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be laid on the table.

SURVEY OF OUACHITA RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department in relation to the survey of the Ouachita River from Camden, Arkansas, to Trinity, Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEWIS BEHR.

On motion of Mr. KILLINGER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Lewis Behr, no adverse report having been made on them.

E. MASON.

On motion of Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of E. Mason, now before the Committee on Claims, no adverse report having been made.

ISAAC L. JACKSON.

On motion of Mr. MCDILL, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Isaac L. Jackson, now referred to the Committee on Claims, no adverse report having been made on them.

J. & R. H. PORTER.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of J. & R. H. Porter, no adverse report having been made on them.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MARSHALL, Mr. PHILLIPS and Mr. BRIGHT were, by unanimous consent, granted leave to print in the RECORD, as part of the debates, remarks on the currency question. (See Appendix.)

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending paragraph has been limited by the House to ten minutes.

Mr. SPEER. What is the pending motion?

The CHAIRMAN. Strike out line 953 to the word "war," on the next line, and insert "for completing and publishing for distribution the Medical and Surgical History of the War," $64,000.

Mr. FORT. I desire to so modify my amendment as to leave the bill as it is, and to introduce an additional paragraph. On inquiry at the Surgeon-General's office, I understand $60,000 is quite enough for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his amendment.

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir. I offer now the following, to come in after line 956.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War, $60,000.

Mr. SPEER. But the gentleman does not provide in his amendment for the distribution of this Medical and Surgical History of the War.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I inquired at the Surgeon-General's office this morning in reference to the statements made on the floor yesterday in regard to the publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War. I find that if the unexpended balances on hand are now reappropriated it will enable the Surgeon-General to go on with the remaining volumes and he will be able to complete them.

I desire to supplement the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.] I have no doubt the time is coming when additional copies of the volumes already printed will be much needed and desired by the public. It will take from two to two and a half years to have the plates prepared for the publication of those volumes. Therefore I provide in my amendment that all the necessary engraving and lithographing for this work shall be executed under the Secretary of War without advertisement. That is what the law was before in the act of 1867 authorizing the publication of this history of the war. This is a very valuable document and a great deal of it has been already stereotyped. The country has obtained much information from these medical and surgical reports. These medical and surgical reports have been confined to five thousand copies. If you confine the number to five thousand which you propose to distribute, and they are sent to certain societies, schools, and individuals, very few will be left for the country at large. There are now being published the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth volumes.

This additional publication would seem to be necessary for that purpose. I therefore ask that my amendment may be read and incorporated with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment these words:

To be used in the preparation of illustrations for a new edition of five thousand copies of the entire work: Provided, That the necessary engraving and lithographing for this publication may be executed under the direction of the Secretary of War without advertisement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole for a moment to the effect of the amendment. We have appropriated already, more than a year ago, a sufficient sum to complete the publication of this very important work—the Medical and Surgical History of the War. Two volumes are already out, and we have provided in this clause of the bill to reappropriate what would otherwise be covered into the Treasury in order to complete the publication during the coming year. It will take a year longer to complete the publication, and there has been money enough appropriated for that purpose.

And now the gentleman proposes to make an appropriation of $60,000 to republish the volumes that have already been published, and to make that appropriation now. I suggest that it is unwise to do this away in advance of the completion of the work. Let us wait until the whole set of volumes is ready, which will be by the end of next year; and then if gentlemen wish to appropriate a sum for the republication of the old volumes along with the new, it can be done, so that the work may go out in sets. But if you now make this appropriation and immediately republish the two volumes already out, you will have a gap of nearly a year between them, and people will not get them in sets. It would be almost like tossing away the value of a work of this kind to have it issued in that way. I hope these amendments will not be agreed to, and next year when we are told that the whole work is ready for publication we can arrange for publishing all the volumes together.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be an amendment in the third degree. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEER. I wish my colleague to accept these words:

To be distributed as heretofore.

By not providing for the manner of distribution he destroys the virtue of his amendment. Unless this provision is made the Surgeon-General will distribute the work.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I accept the words suggested by my colleague and incorporate them with my amendment. I now withdraw my amendment as modified, that my colleague [Mr. STRAWBRIDGE] may renew it.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE. I renew the amendment of my colleague. There has never yet been published by the Government any book that compares in value with this work, the Medical and Surgical History of the War. The five thousand copies which have been printed only reached a very few members of the medical profession. There were more than ten thousand surgeons who served during the war, most of whom have contributed in some measure to the value of this work, all of whom demand, and I think are justly entitled to, copies of it. I think that no more graceful compliment could be paid to men who have given such valuable services during the war than to furnish them with copies of the work.

Mr. DONNAN. This is a valuable work, I concede, but I think we cannot attempt to supply the entire medical profession with it.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. DONNAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he had done so.

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE. I do not propose that the Government shall furnish to every physician throughout the country a copy of the work, but I do think that it should furnish copies to those who have contributed articles to it, and to those surgeons who have given faithful and valuable services in the Army and whose labors have served to furnish the material for the work.

Mr. BROMBERG. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. Is it not true that this amendment is necessary for this reason, that the present members of Congress received the third and fourth volumes, or whatever volumes are now in print, and that without this amendment they will be without the first and second?

Mr. SPEER. Certainly.

Mr. BROMBERG. Is this not necessary in order to give them the privilege of completing the set?

Mr. STRAWBRIDGE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time limited for debate on this question has expired. No further debate on it is in order.

Mr. FORT. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] as modified.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make an inquiry, not in the nature of debate; whether the proposition involves the right of persons to buy after the sets are completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to be informed on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in the nature of debate.

Mr. SPEER rose.

Mr. FORT. I hope the committee will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. SPEER. I have been on the floor half a dozen times to say a few words on this question, but I seem never to be in order on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] accepts the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.] The whole amendment will now be read, as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War, to be distributed as heretofore, $60,000; to be used in the preparation of illustrations for the new edition of five thousand copies of the entire work: Provided, That the necessary engraving and lithographing for these publications may be executed under the direction of the Secretary of War without advertisement.

Mr. FORT. Allow me to say this, that over $200,000 have already been appropriated and expended for collecting this information; and now I think we should have it in a complete form.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 87, noes 59.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To provide for the payment under existing laws for horses and other property ost or destroyed in the military service of the United States, $50,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. I offer the following amendment:

For the next fiscal year the assistant treasurer in New York may so adjust the salaries of employés in the sub-treasury in New York as will enable him to retain the services of experts: Provided, That the aggregate appropriation for such salaries shall not thereby be increased.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I raise the point of order that that amendment is new legislation.

Mr. MERRIAM. I will explain to the gentleman from Vermont the object of this amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is the point of order waived?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not waive the point of order, but am willing that the gentleman from New York should explain.

Mr. MERRIAM. The assistant treasurer in New York has two or three experts engaged in counting gold, one of whom is able to detect fraud better than any one else has ever been able to do in this country. He has been offered more by brokers than he is receiving in the sub-treasury. The assistant treasurer last year, in order to retain his services, took money out of his own pocket and paid this man in order to keep him there. Now, he is willing to reduce the salaries of some of the other clerks in order to provide properly for this branch of the service. He does not ask a single dollar more of appropriation than has hitherto been appropriated. I think gentlemen will admit that any officer intrusted with the care and custody of over $100,000,000 of public moneys ought be trusted to arrange the salaries of two or three clerks, where he secures thereby the retention of efficient clerks without cost to the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont insist on his point of order?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that if there is anything in the law which renders it impossible to do what is proposed here, the amendment certainly changes the law, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. BRADLEY. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 973 insert the following:
For a resurvey of the Au Sable River, Michigan, and establishing dock lines, not exceeding $1,000, to be paid for from the unexpended balance of appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of said river.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. It makes no new appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 420 add the following:
For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of surveying the lands of the Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. I offer the following as a proviso to be added to the amendment just adopted:

Provided, That none but citizens of the country in the sections where the lands lie shall be employed to do the work of surveying.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I object to that.

The amendment of Mr. VANCE was not agreed to.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 973 add the following:
Provided, That the time for filing claims for horses lost prior to January 1, 1872, be, and the same is hereby, extended to and including the 30th day of June, 1875.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that changes existing legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not press the point of order. This is a very necessary amendment to this clause of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It is a limitation on the payment of this money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. THORNBURG. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 973 add the following:
For experimenting with new inventions in small-arms and the mitrailleuse, by the Ordnance Department, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $10,000.

I suppose there will be no objection to this amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Smithsonian grounds, $10,000.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move to amend by striking out "$10,000" and inserting "$5,000."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to state here, not only in reference to this particular appropriation, but in reference to all those which follow in relation to the public reservations and grounds about Washington, what course the Committee on Appropriations has pursued. In the first place we have endeavored to keep the appropriations down to the figures that have been given for some years past, not desiring to make any increase. In the next place we have cut down from the estimates over 60 per cent., so that the amount given in the bill is but about a third of what was asked for.

Now to come more into detail, the committee has put most or a large portion of these appropriations for Government squares and reservations on to these reservations and public squares that lie most largely in open view, and more especially those tracts that lie between the foot of the Capitol grounds and the upper end of the city opposite the new State Department; and for this reason: that those grounds are from year to year more and more exposed to public view, and are more and more frequented. Roads and drives are opened and are being opened through them. Undoubtedly in the end and at no very distant day, and with no great expense, all of these grounds will be thrown into one broad park or mall, so that there will be an easy and pleasant drive from one part of the city to the other through these grounds. They have presented for some time an unsightly appearance. They have been an eyesore to gentlemen either driving or walking in that direction, as I think I shall be sustained in saying.

The committee have put a considerable sum on to those tracts of land. It is the design not to interfere with the use to which they are now put. The day has come when fences or inclosures are no longer needed about the governmental grounds. There is nothing running wild or loose about the city that can interfere with them, and the fences all around are being taken down, so that there is nothing to prevent free access, ingress and egress, to these grounds.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will answer any question.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I want to know if these improvements are to be made with a view to that future arrangement?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The improvements are to be made with a view to that future arrangement. I am suffering from a severe cold, and I shall be glad if gentlemen will put questions in relation to this portion of the bill, which unluckily was given to me to examine, as briefly as they can.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine if he can tell what was done with the money appropriated last year for the Smithsonian grounds?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will say that I have a list showing the appropriations that were made and the disposition of them for all these tracts last year.

Mr. DUNNELL. I refer to these Smithsonian grounds.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have got the items here.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will say that I was in the Smithsonian grounds the other day, and I made a search for some evidence of the expenditure of any money during the last year. The only thing that I discovered was that some portion of the fence has been torn down. Five hundred dollars or a thousand dollars would have done for any private individual twice the amount of work that was done on these grounds. We have got into a rut of giving just so much every year, either twenty, fifteen, ten, or five thousand dollars, as the case may be, and we stay in that old rut, giving that amount every year, no matter how much work has been done, or how little. Ten thousand dollars would pay for all the work that has ever been done on these grounds, and we have given $10,000 a year for five years. They are slovenly to this day, and yet we appropriated $10,000 last year for their improvement. Can anybody tell where that money went?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do not know of any way in which money is more apt to be squandered than in the improvement of grounds. I am told that there are about forty acres of these Smithsonian grounds, and we are in the habit of appropriating $10,000 a year for their improvement. Out in Ohio we make a great many miles of turnpike road for $10,000. Year after year you are giving $10,000 to improve forty acres of ground. It does seem to me to be very extravagant, and I hope the amount will be cut down to $5,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, in addition to what my colleague on the committee has said, that more than twenty acres have been added to the public lands lying between this Capitol and the President's House by the filling up of the old canal, which was itself a pestilent thing and the source of pestilence everywhere. It is now nearly filled up, and the filling up of it has added all this land to the grounds between here and the President's House, and of course the Smithsonian Institution takes its share of the twenty acres, lying, as it does, on the borders of it.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I observe that there is another appropriation in the bill of $10,000 for the improvement of the grounds of the old canal.

Mr. GARFIELD. But there is a portion of the canal that does not abut on these grounds at all. Now, if gentlemen will remember that each one of these groups of grounds that lie along here have got to be adjusted with a view to taking in its portion of the canal which they had not before, they will see that some additional improvements have to be made.

I am surprised, sir, that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has exhausted the whole engineering phase of the question by going down on the canal and swinging around on his left heel, and then coming here and saying that he sees nothing that has been done there except to pull down some fences. Sir, there have been two hundred and twenty iron posts set there during all last year, there have been eight hundred and sixty pounds of chain fencing put up there, and besides that there has been the work of keeping the grounds in order. If gentlemen will understand that a raw, uncultivated piece of ground, lying in a swampy place, must be thoroughly underdrained and put into condition before they can have anything that shows on the surface, they will see the propriety of appropriating enough money to put these grounds in order. Furthermore, there is a thorough plan on which all the work of putting these grounds in order is being done, and every dollar we appropriate here is simply used in working out that plan. It is not a loose paying out of money to be thrown away just for the sake of having an appropriation, but a plan which I am sure all gentlemen will be proud of when they see it realized. We have cut down these appropriations fully one-half.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I renew it. I am very glad to learn from the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that this is part of a plan. I had wondered for a long time what this constant appropriation with nothing to show for it did mean. I have learned at length that it is a part of a plan. Now I am opposed to plans; they do not work well, and this plan is simply taking money out of the Treasury constantly, without anything to show in return. If something beneficial was to be accomplished, if the country was to be benefited, or any good whatever brought about that we could see, I do not know that I should oppose this appropriation; but as I am unable to see any beneficial result to a single individual from this constant expenditure by the Government, it is a plan that I think it would be well to stop right here. I think the idea suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is an excellent one, that we should jump out of the rut, that we should run off the track, that we should have a collision if necessary, for the purpose of getting into the right direction, and because I think that a little stirring up might be good for all of us. I shall certainly vote against this appropriation. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, to reduce the appropriation to $5,000, and on a division there were—ayes 40, noes 51; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, of Maine, and Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For a pedestal for Ball's marble statue of Lincoln, to be placed in Lincoln Square, $3,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment:

Insert after the words "Lincoln Square" the words "or such reservation as the President may select."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STANARD. I move further to amend that clause by striking out the word "marble" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "bronze."

Mr. GARFIELD. The statue is one that is already prepared. The gentleman from Missouri is acquainted with it, and if he says it is of bronze his amendment ought to prevail. I supposed it was a marble statue.

Mr. STANARD. It is a bronze one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing improvement of Judiciary Square; purchase of seats, trees, and evergreens, and for fountain, $10,000; and the jail building situated on said square shall be sold as soon as practicable, and the money obtained therefor shall be placed in the Treasury to the credit of the fund for the improvement of said square.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how much is expected to be realized from the sale of the materials of the old jail?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Probably from fifteen hundred to two thousand dollars.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to add to the paragraph the following:

And the building situated thereon, known heretofore as the City Hall, shall be under the care and control of the Attorney-General, who shall cause to be collected such rents as may be or become due to the United States for the use of such portions of said building as may be in the occupancy of other parties than the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that that amendment will come in more properly at a point further on, where we make an appropriation for this building.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE Very well; I withdraw it for the present.

The following was read:

For work and grading in and around the Botanic Gardens, $11,925.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by inserting after the word "gardens" the words "and to complete the brick wall and iron fence." I also move that the paragraph as amended be transferred to a former portion of the bill, to come in after the paragraph for improving the Capitol grounds.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The following was read:

For continuing macadamizing of conduit road, $5,000.

Mr. FORT. I should like to hear some explanation about all this matter. I have no amendment to offer, but I will move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking whose road this is and where it goes?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a road of the United States along the line of the aqueduct to the Great Falls some fourteen miles away. We have to keep it in repair, and keep, watchmen to guard and protect it.

Mr. FORT. A gentleman by my side suggests that it is a road to specie payments.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a good, solid foundation for it.

Mr. FORT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, can state how much money is appropriated for all the purposes and all the uses of this District? We seem to find appropriations for this District in every bill that comes up, in every part of every bill, scattered all the way through them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is quite mistaken about that. There is in this bill $227,655 for the improvements in and around the Capitol, on property belonging wholly to the United States. Not a dollar of the items which have been read here is for any property except that of the United States. The fact that it is located in the city of Washington does not necessarily make against the appropriation for it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. What public use is made of Cabin John bridge and Griffith Park bridge which should require an appropriation of $5,800?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is an aqueduct, the largest in the world, built by the United States over a chasm, and up to last year we have had a simple wooden railing to it. That railing had rotted away until it was in the highest degree dangerous for anybody to drive across the bridge. It was our own method of going along the line of our water-works until we reached the reservoir. A sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations visited it last year, and upon their report we deemed it proper to make an appropriation to put up a stone railing, of the same material as the bridge itself. This year we appropriate enough to macadamize and asphalt the roadway within the railings.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman does not answer my question at all. Everybody knows that an aqueduct may need repair. But what is there in the nature of a public use of this road that requires a $5,000 asphalt pavement across the bridge? That is the point.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend will appreciate the point when the statement is made that this asphalt is for a double purpose. We need the road in going over the whole length of the aqueduct to see that it is in repair, as we constantly need to do. But we need the asphaltum for the special purpose of preventing any harm coming to the body of the work itself, preventing the elements working down through the upper part of the bridge. The asphalt is required to shed the rain to prevent the disintegration of the stone which forms the aqueduct.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have very great respect for the gentleman from Ohio, but that strikes me as the absurdest explanation I ever heard.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw my formal amendment and move to strike out the paragraph embraced in lines 1064 and 1065, "for continuing macadamizing of conduit road $5,000." I understand that $16,000 was appropriated last year to keep this road in repair. Now, it seems to me that $16,000 ought to keep any road in repair in this District for two years. This is not a very long road.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The appropriation last year was for completing the macadamizing of this road, $16,000; this appropriation is to continue the macadamizing of it.

Mr. FORT. If it was completed last year it certainly cannot want any repairs on it this year. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I want to move to strike out that portion relating to the roadway over Griffith Park bridge and over Cabin John bridge.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to going back.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph under consideration is the one in relation to macadamizing of conduit road.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] made a motion in regard to the paragraph embraced in lines 1054 to 1063.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. He made a motion in regard to that paragraph, and a discussion arose in regard to it. Then he withdrew his amendment and instantly moved another in regard to the next paragraph. Almost immediately upon seeing that his last motion related to the next paragraph I called the attention of the Chair to the amendment I desired to submit in regard to the paragraph relating to the Washington aqueduct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the motion upon the statement of the gentleman.

The paragraph referred to by Mr. G. F. HOAR was as follows:

Washington aqueduct: For engineering, maintenance, and general repairs, $15,000; for building a wooden fence around Government land at the Great Falls, $1,500; for building dwelling and office at Great Falls, $1,500; for paving the roadway over Griffith Park bridge and over Cabin John bridge with asphalt pavement, $5,800; for furnishing and setting four magneto-dial instruments in connection with the telegraph line from Great Falls to Georgetown, $1,100.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out the words "for paving the roadway over Griffith Park bridge and over Cabin John bridge with asphalt pavement, $5,800." I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole for a moment to this matter. This Cabin John bridge is situated on a rough country road running along for six or eight miles in the direction of this aqueduct; it is one of the rudest roads in this District. Of course it is important that the aqueduct should be carefully maintained and securely guarded. But it seems to me a very unnecessary expenditure to build an asphalt pavement over that bridge at a cost of $5,000. The gentleman from Ohio says that such a pavement is necessary to prevent the disintegration of the aqueduct by the elements working down. But the aqueduct is exposed in the same way everywhere else in its course. This appropriation seems to me to be merely for the ornamentation of that bridge. I submit that unless some better explanation be given the appropriation should not be made.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. G. F. HOAR, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 26, noes not counted.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. FORT, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida: For commencing the rebuilding of the repairing-dock, $250,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. For the purpose of enabling me to make an inquiry I move to strike out this paragraph. I would like to know how entensive this work is expected to be and how much it will cost?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Several hundred thousand dollars. The purpose of the appropriation is to rebuild the old dock that was destroyed during the war.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the navy-yard at Norfolk, Virginia: For iron-plating shops, $50,000.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read, the following:

For the removal of the powder-magazine from Norfolk, Virginia, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, $50,000.

I send to the Clerk and ask him to read a letter on this subject from the chief of the Bureau of Ordnance. I ask the attention of the committee to the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, June 5, 1874.

SIR: In compliance with your request I have the honor to state that the Bureau's estimate for the removal of the naval magazine at Fort Norfolk, Virginia, is $50,000.

Permit me to avail myself of this opportunity to again urge upon you the necessity, pressing and immediate, for the removal of this magazine, surrounded, as it is very nearly, by manufactories, and exposed on the water-front to danger from passing steam vessels.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

WILLIAM N. JEFFERS,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will occupy but a very few moments in calling attention to the necessity of this measure. This powder-magazine is at the entrance of Norfolk Harbor, and the city of Norfolk has grown up to and around it. It is separated from the Atlantic Iron-works by only a brick wall; and sparks from the chimneys of those works are continually flying over this magazine, which contains an enormous deposit of powder. Three times within the last two years the lawn in front of the magazine has taken fire from the sparks of passing steamers. Successive Secretaries of the Navy in every annual report for the last ten years have recommended the immediate removal of the magazine from its present position. Last year the Committee on Appropriations, after giving the matter careful consideration, inserted this item which I now move as an amendment; but in the House it was struck out on a point of order made by a member then representing an Illinois district, it being held that the appropriation was not authorized by existing law. To prevent anything of that kind this year, a bill was introduced by me early in the session, which has since passed both Houses and become a law, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to remove this magazine; but of course he cannot do it without an appropriation. The people of Norfolk have petitioned time and again for its removal. Every man, woman, and child in that city goes to bed every night with fear and trembling lest before morning an explosion may occur. I hope the amendment will be adopted without opposition.

Mr. FORT. Will it cost $50,000 to remove this magazine?

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations had two propositions before them with reference to this navy-yard at Norfolk. One was to construct iron-plating shops; the other was the removal of this magazine. As we felt compelled to do something for that yard, we consulted the engineer of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, who thought that the erection of plating-shops was more important than the removal of the magazine. Therefore we have inserted in the bill an appropriation of $50,000 for iron-plating shops. I do not think that we should make both appropriations in this bill.

Mr. ARCHER. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] has remarked, this powder-magazine is now within the limits of the city of Norfolk, being separated by only a single street from large machine-shops in that city, the sparks from which, as he has truly said, pass over and into the grounds almost daily. Large steamships of the Liverpool line pass within one hundred yards of this magazine, within which, at times, there are two thousand tons of powder. The magazine itself is in a dilapidated condition. If an explosion should take place there, scarcely a house in that city would escape damage. Within four miles of that location the Government owns Crany Island, which can be improved at a very moderate cost, and a magazine erected there for the storage of this powder, where there will be no danger from sparks from machine-shops or passing steamers. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] is a wise one, and one which tends to the security of human life. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. BECK. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word. I have some knowledge in reference to this magazine, having examined it at one time in company with the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER.] I wish only to say that this magazine, standing where it now does, with the city of Norfolk grown almost up to it, and large machine-shops in the immediate vicinity, is a standing menace to the people of that city. Such a magazine would not be allowed in any village of one thousand inhabitants anywhere. Crany Island and other places within two or three miles could be selected for the location of this magazine, where it would be absolutely safe.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Will it take $50,000 to remove it?

Mr. BECK. I do not know what it will take, whether it will take fifty or one hundred thousand dollars. It stands upon valuable property. While there may be some difference of opinion as to where it ought to be removed to, there can be but one opinion; its removal ought to take place at once from its present location. In reference to what the cost will be and where it ought to be removed, are things I do not know about. I do not know there is a gentleman in this House who would live in that part of the city of Norfolk with that powder-magazine within half a mile of him. No man's house is safe.

Mr. PARSONS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield to me I will refer to the letter which comes to us from the Navy Department, where it is said "in compliance with your request the Bureau's estimate for the removal is $50,000." That is the estimate of the Navy Department, and this is certainly a proper appropriation to be made.

Mr. BECK. I do not know how that is. I only wish to say the powder-magazine as now located renders insecure millions of property in the city of Norfolk. If any explosion should take place—I do not know that it ever will—I hope it never will, but if it does take place it will endanger the lives of thousands of people. It ought not to be there, wherever else it may be. It ought to be removed so persons living in their own homes may live without a standing menace from this powder-magazine.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead;

An act (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific Railroad Companies;

An act (H. R. No. 764) for the relief of John Dold; and

An act (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while in prison.

It further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army;

An act (H. R. No. 2699) for the relief of Robert Tillson & Co., of Quincy, Illinois;

An act (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of Kerry Sullivan, of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Devine, late assistant surgeon Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry;

An act (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of Henry P. Ingram and John K. Askins;

An act (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John W. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry;

An act (H. R. No. 2698) for the relief of Joseph C. Breckinridge, for services in the Army of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 2416) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the States of Oregon and California in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1872 and 1873;

An act (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter;

An act (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Cavalry Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 1313) for the relief of Alexander Burtch;

An act (H. R. No. 1219) for the relief of Charles W. Berry, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Robert F. Winslow; and

An act (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has the floor.

Mr. BECK. I yield what remains of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. The removal of this magazine is only a question of time, but as to what should be the cost of removing it I know nothing. I consider, however, that common prudence and every consideration which should govern a people as well as a government in a matter of this sort absolutely require this to be done before a great while, and the only question is whether we shall do it now or not. I think myself we should do it immediately. That is the recommendation of the Navy Department.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say a single word on this question. What are the facts in this case? There is now in the neighborhood of Norfolk a large powder-magazine in the immediate neighborhood of a large population, and standing near the water, ships passing it day and night. The explosion of the magazine would inevitably result in the loss of much property and many lives. It ought not to continue there a standing menace to those people.

We know from past sad experience in different portions of the country that these magazines are liable to explode, sometimes through carelessness, sometimes by the effect of electricity. My colleague sitting near me will recollect an occurrence of that kind in the city of Nashville some years ago, which inflicted immense damage. There was a magazine in the neighborhood of the city, supposed to be amply protected, so that the people felt quite safe. It exploded from a flash of lightning in a summer shower, causing a great deal of suffering and injury to property. The removal of this vast collection of powder ought certainly to be made.

A MEMBER. How much is stored there?

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand that there is a large quantity stored. That is my information. If an explosion of this magazine were to take place it would be a lasting disgrace to our civilization that we should allow such an element of danger to exist in the immediate vicinity of a large population.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the following words:

And to provide for the construction of a magazine at a more suitable place near Norfolk.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I accept that, and make it a part of my amendment.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$5,000."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Say $25,000.

Mr. COX. I will make the amount larger, and say $10,000 instead of $5,000.

Gentlemen who know anything about these magazines know that there is some care to be taken in moving the powder. In Greenwich they move powder in copper wheelbarrows, because it is not safe to use iron. But an appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose is utterly absurd. I suppose it is intended to erect a new building with the money. I do not want to appropriate money for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman think that the light-house at Mathias Point is likely to ignite this powder-magazine?

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio has a way of sneering at everybody. Why does he not treat gentlemen as his equals? He should at least take somebody of his own size.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not wish to prolong this debate; but gentlemen have stated on this floor that there is no powder stored in this magazine.

Mr. FORT. I make the point of order that the gentleman has spoken several times already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not spoken before on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me a moment for a question? It has been intimated by the gentlemen around me that there is no powder stored in this magazine.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That is the point I wish to speak to. It has been stated on this floor by gentlemen who know nothing about this subject, and who make a misstatement, that there is no powder kept at this magazine, and that it is only a ruse on my part to get another appropriation for the locality I represent. I will state that this is one of the most important powder-magazines in this country. There are stored over two thousand tons of powder there; and every ship, almost, that went down to the Gulf during the late unpleasantness, or expected unpleasantness, with Spain was supplied with powder from that magazine.

This appropriation of $50,000 has been declared necessary by every Secretary of the Navy during the last ten years—not only for the purpose of removing this powder-magazine, but of constructing in that immediate vicinity, where it will be located at an important point of the Atlantic coast, the most convenient for fitting out our naval vessels. I ask in behalf of the citizens of Norfolk that provision be made for the removal of this magazine from its present most dangerous locality.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It has already been opposed.

Mr. CONGER. Was it opposed by the gentleman from Virgnia, [Mr. PLATT?]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia spoke in opposition to it.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 15, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I now move to strike out "$50,000" and to insert "15,000." I think that amendment will carry.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move to amend by striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$25,000."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, to the amendment, there were—ayes 25, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, and Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 104.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RICE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$50,000" and inserting "$40,000." I believe that is a sufficient amount.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. To save time I agree to that amendment.

Mr. COX. I believe it would not cost $5,000. It is a perfect humbug if you will look into it.

The question being taken on Mr. RICE'S amendment to the amendment, it was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, as amended, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the navy-yard at Mare Island, California: For continuation of begun work, $250,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of that clause:

Provided, That no Chinese or cooly labor shall be so employed as to displace white labor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that that amendment changes existing law.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is new legislation.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I beg to differ with the gentleman; it is not new legislation.

Mr. COX. It is a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. LUTTRELL. It is merely a limitation on the appropriation. I am in receipt of a telegraphic dispatch from Mare Island navy-yard stating that white men are displaced to make room for Chinese.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is within the power of the House to limit any appropriation that it may make.

Mr. MAYNARD. But we had passed this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California rose before the next paragraph was read.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Chair will permit me to call his attention to the fact that this is not a mere limitation on the expenditure. It does not say that the money shall not be employed in a certain way; but it prescribes generally how work going on under a previous law shall be continued. In that respect it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the purport of the amendment to be that the money appropriated for the Mare Island navy-yard shall be expended in a certain way.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me. Suppose that an appropriation of $500,000 should be offered for the Boston post-office and you should say that those $500,000 should only be expended for a particular kind of labor, that would be in order; but if you should provide an appropriation of $500,000 to continue the work now going on, and provide that only a particular kind of labor should henceforth be employed on the post-office, it would be new legislation, and that is the purport of the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Massachusetts in that statement. The Chair does not understand that to be the purport of the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the purport of the proviso to be to limit anything but this appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that this work is done by contract.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I want to say one word, and then the gentleman can talk until he is tired.

Mr. CONGER. I am speaking on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has overruled the point of order. The Chair is of opinion that the purport of the amendment is to limit the expenditure of this appropriation.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, sir, you have sustained me in my proposition by your ruling, and all I have to say is that on Mare Island we have a number——

Mr. CONGER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will suspend.

Mr. CONGER. I desired to raise another point of order, but it requires so much trouble to get a point of order heard that I will not insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. There are hundreds of white men in Mare Island navy-yard who are anxious to be employed, men who have served the country on land and on sea; but I learn from a dispatch I have received that those men have been displaced and cooly and Chinese laborers have been employed in their stead. Hence I ask the adoption of this amendment, and I ask to have the dispatch read. It is from two of the most prominent citizens of Mare Island.

The Clerk read as follows:

VALLEJO, CALIFORNIA, June, 1874.

Hon. J. K. LUTTRELL, M. C., Washington:

Contractor Murphy employs Chinese on dry-dock, in navy-yard. White men can be had. Much feeling here. See Department.

LINTHCOMB & EDGECOMB.

Mr. NIBLACK. They employ white men before election and then turn them out to make way for Chinamen.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir; but I propose that they shall not employ coolies or Chinese at all. I want no man employed in that navy-yard because he votes according to my way of thinking or against me. I want men who have served their country on land and sea employed to the exclusion of Chinamen; and I ask gentlemen on the other side of the House to sustain me in this.

Mr. MAYNARD. As I understand it, these persons are employed by contractors.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. We have no control over contractors.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Very well; that is for the House to decide.

Mr. COX. I do not know that there is much use for anybody in the minority of this House to say anything upon this miscellaneous appropriation bill. Everything seems to have been cut and dried, even to the matter of champagning members and bringing them in here to vote for the most extraordinary appropriations on almost every subject. I beg, however, to remind gentlemen of this House of one thing: that is, that they are to-day misrepresentatives of the people of the United States. If a vote were to be taken to-day, judging by the recent elections, the people of the United States would make this House thoroughly democratic, or something more independent than the majority of the House is now.

Mr. GARFIELD, (in his seat.) You are not a democrat, then.

Mr. COX. I would say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that when he wants to interrupt me, he must get up out of his seat, and be my equal. I am taller than he is when he sits down.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Or when he gets up.

Mr. COX. Or when he gets up, in a moral sense. I am not an advocate of any particular kind of labor. I would like to see all kinds of men employed, black, red, yellow, and black. But from my observations at Mare Island, three years ago, of the particular tactics of the republican politicians out there, I think some reform is needed. When I was out there three years ago, I saw a ticket used at an election, and it was a curiosity. The ticket was about that long, [holding his hands some two feet apart,] and about half an inch wide. The names upon it were printed in such small letters that you could not read them without a microscope. I carried that ticket in my pocket-book until I went to the Baltimore convention to vote for Greeley, and somebody stole it from me.

Mr. TREMAIN. After you voted for Greeley, did you not feel smaller than the letters on that ticket?

Mr. COX. I found afterward that the man who took my pocket-book did not belong to the Greeley party, but to the party of my honorable friend who had the honor of defeating me in New York as Congressman at large.

Mr. NEGLEY. The gentleman is occupying my seat. I object to his taking a seat here for the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX. It is not often that so much sense is spoken in this place as I hope to speak in about one minute. I will avail myself of the courtesy of my honorable friend who has just been renominated at Pittsburgh, and who I hope will be defeated.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen to the condition of things in California. You, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. DAWES,] and I were there three years ago. You know that everybody in that State of both parties was opposed to crowding out the white labor of that State. The Chairman shakes his head. There is nothing in it, gentlemen—I mean in the expression of dissent.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word, for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen of this committee to this fact: that this matter of selection of laborers is under the control of the contractors who are doing the work at the Mare Island navy-yard. There are no gentlemen in this House who are more tenacious than my friend from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] and his associates politically, of having all the Government work contracted for to the lowest bidder. This is the way this work is being done; advertisements were published, specifications were made, and contracts given to the lowest bidder. These laborers are employed by the contractors, and the Government of the United States has no control whatever over them. If the gentleman from California wants to have the men he refers to employed, let him apply to the contractors who have control of the matter, and induce them, if he can, to turn away these "heathen Chinee," and employ the white laborers he desires to have employed.

Mr. RAINEY. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] will not be adopted. It is a species of legislation that I have never before seen introduced here since I have been a member of this House.

We have by our legislation invited foreigners to our shores, invited them to come here and make their homes. We have said to them that they should enjoy here all the blessings of civilization that are enjoyed by any of our people. They come here and are willing to work and assist in the development of this country. Chinamen are contributing their labor to the development of California. If they are willing to work cheaper than white men are willing to work, I do not see why we should say, by an amendment to this bill, that they should not be employed and paid out of the money appropriated by the Government.

The gentleman endeavored to make a political point, so far as the employment of Chinese laborers is concerned. If I understand the true condition of the Chinese in California, they are not allowed to vote there; they are not voters in that State. If they are employed there, it is because perhaps that they are better adapted to the work than are white men, or perhaps they can be employed more cheaply than white men are willing to do the work for.

Mr. FORT. They are not citizens.

Mr. RAINEY. Very well; that is no reason why they should not be employed. Gentlemen on the other side have said that republicans out there were willing to employ these Chinese laborers, and the intimation has been made that there was some political motive in it, some political trick in it. I say that there is no political trick in it at all. They are not voters. If the men who employ them are republicans they do not employ them because they expect to control their votes, which is very likely to be the case where white men exercising the elective franchise are employed.

I say that the Chinaman, the Indian, the negro, and the white man should all occupy an equal footing under this Government; should be accorded equal right to make their livelihood and establish their manhood. I hope we shall not adopt here to-day any class legislation such as is proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from California. I trust that we shall not undertake to say that we will not permit Chinamen to be employed under appropriations made by the Government; for when we have proscribed this class of people, not many days will elapse before we shall have a proposition presented that negroes shall not be employed under appropriations made by the Government. Representing in part, if I may so say, the China-man, at least by complexion; representing in part the negro; representing in part the white man, I am in favor of equal rights for every class of citizens upon this continent. I renew my solemn protest against any such class legislation as is proposed in the pending amendment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. LUTTRELL, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to amend by inserting after line 1084 the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make, out of any money at his disposal available for the purpose, sufficient and appropriate compensation and acknowledgment to the owners, officers, and sailors of the British whaling and sealing steamers that contributed to the rescue of the survivors of the Polaris for such rescue and any loss sustained by reason thereof, and for their humane and hospitable reception, entertainment, and transportation until they were all finally and safely landed in Newfoundland and Scotland.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have no objection to making compensation to these men; but I object to having the money taken from that appropriated for repairs at the navy-yards.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This does not come out of that fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of grounds, Department of Agriculture: For labor, $8,000; for repairing concrete roads and walks, $500; for tools, wagons, lawn-mowers, carts, and general repairs of the same, $600; for improving new grounds gained by filling canal, draining, surfacing, sodding, and for two cart-horses, $7,000; in all, $16,100.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For the museum, to be expended under the direction of Professor Glover, $1,500.

I believe there will be no objection to this amendment. It proposes a little additional appropriation for the very interesting and curious museum, in the Agricultural Department, of insects injurious to vegetation. Two years ago the House, after full discussion, appropriated $3,000 for the establishment of this museum, and the appropriation was voted almost unanimously. The expenditure was made with conscientious economy by Professor Glover; and a very considerable portion of the $3,000 was covered back into the Treasury. He now wants this small additional sum of $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move further to amend by inserting the following:

For the purchase of Duby's cryptogamic herbarium, as much as may be necessary, not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. This amendment I believe is liable to a point of order. It provides for a matter which is not contemplated by any existing law. I will, however, reserve the point of order till the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has been heard upon his amendment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This appropriation is for an expenditure in connection with the museum at the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand that these amendments come from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This amendment is recommended by officers of the Agricultural Department—Professor Glover and others—in letters which I have here. The study of the wonders of the cryptogamic plants, as they are called—plants that multiply without any visible flower—has become very important in the application of science to agriculture. The potato-rot, the plum-disease, the yellows, and several other diseases affecting our fruit trees and important agricultural productions, are understood to be caused by little fungi which can only be detected by the microscope, and the means of suppressing and destroying which are known to only a very few scientific men in the world.

In order to prosecute this study it becomes necessary to have these collections of specimens. There are three or four of such collections in the world. One of the very best is owned by a man named Duby at Constantinople. There is none whatever in this country. In order that the observations and researches at the Agricultural Department may be prosecuted according to the demand made by letters and applications from farmers, fruit-growers, and others in all parts of the country, it is desirable to have a complete collection of fungi for examination and comparison. The mushroom is a very important article of food in many European countries, being not a mere luxury, but in many places absolute food for the peasant. It is to some extent coming into use in the same way in this country. We have a very large number of esculent mushrooms; but they cannot be distinguished with certainty from poisonous plants resembling them except by some comparisons of the kind here contemplated.

This is a little matter. If it were necessary to detain the House further, I would have the letter read.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit to the superior agricultural knowledge of my friend from Massachusetts, and therefore withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOAR'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move the following amendment, and I hope no one will raise the point of order. It is an important matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars" in line 1093, insert the following: "For the salary of a commissioner of forestry for one year, $2,500."

Mr. SPEER. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SPEER. That it creates a new office, and makes an appropriation not warranted by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the gentleman's point of order, and rules the amendment out.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment to come in after line 1093:

For publishing the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1872 and 1873, to be distributed as heretofore, $50,000.

I hope no member of this House will object to this amendment. It will publish about two hundred thousand copies of this valuable report, as I am informed.

Mr. GARFIELD. That must, under the law, go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law, and is, therefore, not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a law that any proposition for printing more than five hundred copies of any work must go to the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. FORT. But my amendment does not state any number of volumes. It simply appropriates a certain sum to be expended in publishing this report.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The amendment also provides for distributing these Agricultural Reports as heretofore. That also is a change of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that to be in violation of the law. They are to be distributed as they have been heretofore.

Mr. FORT. My amendment does not provide for printing any particular number beyond, and will not authorize the book to be sent free in the mail. We will have to pay thirty-three cents postage on each volume as we do now. My amendment does not affect the postal law.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is in order.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The amendment can be construed to re-enact the franking privilege and distribute these Agricultural Reports as they have been heretofore, free through the mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the amendment provides for distributing the Agricultural Reports free through the mails, and holds the gentleman's amendment to be in order.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It ought to be changed in its phraseology, for the provision for distributing them as heretofore may be construed into a re-enactment of the franking privilege.

Mr. FORT. I am willing to add such a proviso to it, that it shall not be construed to be entitled to distribution through the mails free. I am willing to pay the postage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment to be in order.

Mr. FORT. I hope it will be adopted. In my judgment we cannot expend this amount of money to any better advantage; and I believe that it will return a larger profit to the general prosperity of the country than if applied in any other manner. Agriculture lies at the foundation of the prosperity of the whole country. Anything that will promote it will benefit every portion of the Republic. Mr. Chairman, a gentleman over on the other side of the House asks me whether I am a granger. It matters not to me what he calls me. I desire to represent the people of my district, most of whom are agriculturists, and every one of whom is interested in, and dependent upon, the prosperity of agriculture. They are for the most part tillers of the soil. They contribute to the wealth of the country and to the support of the Government. They pay their portion of the vast appropriations we make, not a single dollar of which is expended in their midst. And for them and in their name I here on this floor demand that a small sum of money shall be appropriated where it will give them some information appropriate to their calling and do them some good. And am I asking much? The people that each member here represents will share in this benefit the same as the people I represent.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment ought not to be so drawn as to leave it possible to the construction, if it should be adopted, that it is a re-enactment of the franking privilege.

Mr. FORT. I have already agreed to the proviso that these Agricultural Reports are not by this amendment to go through the mails free.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that large amounts of money are expended annually in keeping up the Agricultural Department. For my part I am not able to see any use in continuing that expenditure unless the valuable information thus collected at large expense is distributed among the people—among those who need the information; among those engaged in agricultural pursuits. I do not come here as the especial champion of any class, but as a representative of agriculturists I demand that their interest shall not be overlooked, and must be considered here. It is well known the information gathered by the Agricultural Department is not only valuable to those who cultivate the soil as farmers, but is also sought for and considered valuable by gentlemen who cultivate their gardens only, and thus this report will reach almost all classes.

And further, Mr. Chairman, whatever will benefit the agricultural portion of this country, it occurs to me, is of benefit to all the country. For my part I can see no objection to disseminating the knowledge which has been gleaned and gathered for that purpose. If it is proper to have a report made by the Commissioner of Agriculture, made and printed as has been done, it is certainly best to distribute that report among the people. It does but little if any good to the agricultural interest of the county to make this report to the President or to Congress if it is not thereafter communicated to the people. If any discovery has been made, if anything to the advantage of agriculture has been found by this Department, it should be taught to those who till the soil. The President or the Cabinet or members of Congress will not be likely to study these lessons as much as they should do perhaps, but the people will learn these lessons to advantage.

There is no report of any Department of the Government to my knowledge which is so much sought after as that report of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Ten applications are made for it where one is made for any other, and we are overwhelmed with letters asking for it. We are importuned for it constantly, and our people seem to accept no explanation as to our inability to supply them. We answer them that it has not been published for distribution, and they will reply by saying that it ought to be and must be published. It seems impossible to satisfy them that it is impossible to furnish this report to them.

The gentleman on the other side says that half of them cannot read. Sir, if he intends this as a slur, I hurl it back at him and tell him that many of them could teach certain gentlemen to read more accurately than they now can read, and many of them can not only read it, but translate it into other languages. Sir, any and all of them can apply the information contained in this valuable report to advantage.

Mr. Chairman, the report proposed to be published under my amendment contains the most valuable information to the farmer of any that has been made, and I do not wish to have it suppressed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not know but it is quite too late to say a word respecting the point of order.

Mr. FORT. I think it is too late. I hope my friend from Vermont will not, even if it is not too late, make objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been decided not to be well taken against the amendment.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I was going to say, if it is not too late for the Chair to revise his ruling, that this is liable to the point of order. It provides for the printing of the Agricultural Reports, and makes an appropriation of $50,000. There is no law authorizing the printing of any Agricultural Reports at all, and therefore an appropriation to pay for the printing of a report not authorized to be printed by law is clearly out of order to an appropriation bill under the rules.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman must be mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont say it is not one of the contingencies of the Agricultural Bureau to have the reports of the Commissioner printed?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman must be mistaken about that.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand that any agricultural report or any other document can be printed except by order of either House of Congress, and then only a certain number can be printed by the order of either House. Any number above that limit must be printed by order of both Houses of Congress. Now, there is no order for printing any number of copies of the Agricultural Report at present in existence. There is no warrant of law for printing any agricultural reports whatever. The bill as it passed the House authorizing the printing of five hundred thousand copies is still in the Senate unacted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that any appropriation which is for the purpose of carrying out any of the contingencies of any of the Departments of the Government is in order in an appropriation bill; and the Chair is of opinion that printing the report of a Department is one of the contingencies of that Department.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to ask the gentleman to take out of his amendment these words: "to be distributed as heretofore."

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. FORT. I cannot modify my amendment in accordance with that suggestion.

I wish to say that this report is all in type, and as I understand it is stereotyped, and no expense is to be incurred except the cost of the paper and printing.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask him a question for information? I see by reference to the second page of this bill that we have already adopted a paragraph appropriating $20,000 for the printing of the Agricultural Department. Does not that appropriation cover this?

Mr. FORT. That is for the printing of the regular monthly and annual reports, and only shows that if the Commissioner makes a report and it is printed, we ought to appropriate enough to distribute it among the people.

Mr. SPEER. How many copies do you propose to provide for by this amendment?

Mr. FORT. I think about two hundred thousand. I am so informed at least.

Mr. SPEER. You ought to increase the number.

Mr. GARFIELD. This does not provide for the printing of any extra copies, and if it did it would be out of order. It does not make provision for any general distribution of this report. It will still require the joint action of both Houses to have extra copies printed. That can only be done by action upon the reports of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FORT. We are always beaten before that committee. I want an open vote here on this floor.

The question being taken on Mr. FORT's amendment, there were—ayes 75, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Court-house and post-office at Omaha, Nebraska: For completion of building, $45,500; and for furniture, $20,000.

Mr. LAMPORT. I offer the following amendment.

After line 1142 insert these words:

Court-house and post-office at Canandaigua, New York: For protection and preservation of the United States court-house and post-office lot in the village of Canandaigua, New York, the sum of $2,000, to be applied to payment of one-half of cost of flagging sidewalks around said lot, and one-half the expense of erecting a fence, to be expended under the direction of the trustees of said village.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that this is not the place for his amendment. We appropriate $200,000 for all that class of repairs on works, and it is not necessary to make a special appropriation for this. Further on in this bill we make a general appropriation for repairs of public buildings.

Mr. LAMPORT. I will state why I offer this amendment, and why the gentleman's suggestion does not apply to it. The Government owns a property in Canandaigua, at the center of the village. All the streets are under the direction of the village trustees, and they have passed an ordinance requiring the flagging of the sidewalks of that village. They are barred from raising money to flag the sidewalks around this lot because of its belonging to the Government of the United States. They are barred from doing this by the law and the Constitution too.

By direction of the board of trustees as well as by direction of the board of supervisors, I am requested to ask an appropriation to flag and fence one-half of the lot, which is owned by the United States jointly with the county of Ontario, on which the court-house and post-office now stand. I wish the House to understand that we have built this court-house and post-office there under peculiar circumstances, having made with the Government a most remarkable covenant, which may account, perhaps, for the request being made to this Government to take care of its property. That court-house was built and the post-office, and a perpetual lease given; and not only that, but the supervisors agreed forever to keep that court-house in repair and to keep it cared for, which has been done for the last ten or twelve years. It is a very fine court-house, and they have paid the sum of $30,000. The Government has the title to this property, and has occupied it for ten years; and the question comes up whether the sidewalks around and about that court-house and post-office shall remain unflagged or shall be flagged; for the authorities of the village cannot do it legally.

I hope the committee will not refuse the appropriation asked for. The amount is $2,000, just one-half of what is required to flag all the sidewalks around the square and put up a suitable fence. It ought to be done in justice to that community.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that this has not been before the Committee on Appropriations. It has been before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I understand it has been there rejected.

Mr. LAMPORT. No, sir.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to make a very brief statement, and if I make an incorrect one the gentleman from New York can make it straight.

Mr. LAMPORT. I will try to.

Mr. TYNER. I think that during the last Congress we appropriated $25,000.

Mr. LAMPORT. No; $18,000.

Mr. TYNER. Well, $18,000.

Mr. LAMPORT. That was a balance due.

Mr. TYNER. That appropriation was to meet the obligations of the United States in the erection of this building, and that, too, upon a contract which provided that after that sum had been paid the county in which this building was located should keep up all repairs in connection with it, even to the extent of rebuilding if it were burned or otherwise destroyed. If I am wrong the gentleman will correct me.

Mr. LAMPORT. The gentleman is correct as far as he goes; that contract was in regard to the building. It did not affect the lot at all, and the county of Ontario has faithfully performed its contract in regard to the building.

Mr. TYNER. Will the gentleman please tell us in whose name the title to the property is?

Mr. LAMPORT. The title to the property in the building is in the United States, conveyed by the county of Ontario, but that does not apply to the lot. It is a better court-house and post-office than there is anywhere in the northern district of New York. If the Government had paid $100,000 or $200,000 for the building, as is usually appropriated for such purposes, we might afford to flag the sidewalks; but we never got the pay the Government owed us for the lot and the building.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman is speaking in my time. I want to put in one further suggestion, and then I am done. This matter was before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the last Congress, and it was distinctly understood there that the payment of the sum appropriated by that Congress would release the Government of the United States from all obligations in keeping up repairs or anything else connected with the court-house.

Mr. LAMPORT. But not connected with the lot.

Mr. TYNER. That was the understanding at the time, and the appropriation was made with that understanding.

Mr. LAMPORT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the agreement was that the county should keep the building in repair.

The question was taken on Mr. LAMPORT's amendment, and it was not agreed to—ayes 43, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Custom-house and post-office, Port Huron, Michigan: For continuing the building, $75,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$75,000" and inserting "$50,000" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment to come in after line 1178 on page 49:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount awarded by the jury in the case of the condemnation of the lot selected by the Treasury Department for a site for a building for a custom-house, bonded warehouse, court-house, and post-office at Grand Rapids, Michigan, and attendant legal expenses, $70,000.

I submit a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to that appropriation.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1874.

SIR: An act approved February 21, 1873, authorized and directed "the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase by private sale or condemnation, in pursuance of the statutes of the State of Michigan, a suitable lot of ground in the city of Grand Rapids, State of Michigan, and to cause to be erected thereon," &c., to which I would call your attention. In accordance with the provisions of this act, a commission was appointed for the selection of a site.

Several lots located in different parts of the city were included in the process of condemnation, so that the Department could exercise its right of election after the value of the several lots had been determined.

The aggregate amount awarded by the jury in the case of the lot selected by the Department was $68,064.85.

This amount will probably be increased by a small amount by a revision of the proceedings in the case of two of the parties, to which also must be added the expenses of the proceedings.

I have therefore the honor to ask that $75,000 be appropriated during this session of Congress to meet the expenses of the comdemnation of this site.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman of Appropriation Committee, House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am also instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment:

Custom-house and post-office, Albany, New York: For payment of balance due on purchase in part of site for building for the purposes of the General Government at Albany, New York, $5,000.

I present a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to that appropriation.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to advise you that by act March 3, 1873, an appropriation was made of $150,000 for the purchase in part of a site for the custom-house, &c., at Albany, New York, the balance of the amount necessary for said site to be donated by the city of Albany or citizens thereof, and that under this appropriation a site was condemned, in accordance with the statutes of the State of New York, but the award being excessive was rejected, and a site purchased at private sale. The expenses of the condemnation above referred to, amounting to $2,752.05, were, however, paid by decision of the Comptroller from the appropriation referred to, leaving but $147,247.95, which has been paid.

To enable the Department to pay its proportion of the site selected, $150,000, it will be necessary to provide for the deficit, namely, $2,752.05, and the legal expenses attendant upon the purchase, estimated at $2,247.95, making in all $5,000, and I have to request that this amount be included in the sundry civil appropriation bill now before Congress.

Very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I offer the following amendment:

For the purpose of building a court-house and post-office at Auburn, New York, $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not an entirely new building?

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from New York able to state any law authorizing the erection of this building?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the repair and preservation of all the public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $200,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I would inquire whether that is the usual appropriation for those purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the ordinary language.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuation of construction of the building for the State, War, and Navy Departments, $700,000.

Mr. COBURN. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "$700,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Five hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the further construction of said building except for that portion to be used for the State Department and to protect the work already created on that part designed for the other Departments.

Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment is to discontinue the work on the War and Navy Departments, and merely complete the State Department. This is an immense and expensive building. The foundations are in and can be protected, and this amendment provides for the protection of these foundations, and for the continuation of the work on the State Department. I have been informed to-day by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that the present appropriations are sufficient to complete the building. The next paragraph provides for furnishing the building, and it is expected that by the month of August the State Department will move into that building and be able to occupy it.

The War and Navy Departments now have each a good building sufficient for the time, and if we continue this building it will cost many millions more. The part that is now finished, or about finished, has cost nearly $2,000,000, and it is but one-fourth of the entire building, which will cost, therefore, ten or eleven millions before it is finished. I think in view of the stringency of the times, and the fact that we need to husband every dollar, that we have nothing now to go into the sinking fund, and that we may have to borrow money to keep up our credit, we ought to cut down this appropriation to the lowest limit, and that we ought to wait until some future time to build this enormous, this magnificent, and very expensive building.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that the present War Department and Navy Department were sufficient?

Mr. COBURN. The building in which the War Department is now situated is a very good building.

Mr. KELLOGG. I want to say that the War Department now occupies thirteen buildings in this city, and half of them are not fit to contain the records, and none of them are suitable places for the purposes of the Department.

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman did not allow me to complete my answer.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and I hope it will not be seriously entertained by this committee. This building, commenced in 1871, has so far approached its completion that the wing designed for the State Department will be finished during the ensuing fall. Of the balance of the building the foundations are down, or they are being laid. The granite for the superstructure of the State Department wing is all cut, also a large portion of that for the basement of the rest of the building, and the building is in just the worst possible condition it could be in for stopping work on it now and postponing it. There is the most pressing necessity on the part of both the War and the Navy Departments, and particularly the War Department, for accommodations for their business. They are paying a large sum annually for rent of buildings in this city, and the valuable records are scattered in a large number of buildings all over the city, subject to risks by fire and other risks.

I do not think it is the policy of the Government after having commenced work on a building of this kind to cease operations, throw out of employment the men engaged on it, and set the example of bankruptcy by stopping work on so important a building on the ground that it has no means.

Mr. SPEER. Can the gentleman state how many million dollars this building will cost before it is completed?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that all the estimates have been made and I have them in the committee-room. The whole cost of the building will not exceed $10,000,000. It will contain a much larger quantity of space than the present Treasury Department, and when the Treasury Department has been completed it will have cost as much as this new and magnificent building costs. I believe the committee will not seriously entertain this proposition, and therefore I will not occupy more time.

Mr. KASSON. Let me call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the fact that in this bill there is an appropriation made on page 37 to purchase a lot and building thereon adjoining Winder's building, which already belongs to the United States. That does not look as if it was intended to complete a new War Department, and make it sufficient to supply the places of all these buildings that we rent outside. There is also an appropriation to purchase a lot on another street.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa that the appropriation to which he refers has no connection with this building. The new War Department, when completed, will be ample for all purposes and will accommodate all the offices, and there will be no necessity whatever to occupy outside buildings. I do not think the appropriation to which he calls my attention, and with which I have had nothing to do, is asked for, because while the War Department occupies Winder's building they are unwilling to have any other building constructed on this vacant lot adjoining it, and the only way to prevent that was for the United States to purchase it. The Secretary of War therefore asked that it might be purchased. With the utmost diligence with which this work can be pressed it would be impossible to complete it within the next four or five years, even with the money appropriated by this bill, which is a very small amount for so important a building. We do not know when it will be completed if Congress now stops making appropriations for it.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. The reason I rise is that I want to know from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] if he is prepared now to tell us how much this State Department building has cost up to this time? I am informed by intelligent and well-informed subordinate officers in the Treasury Department that a year or more ago the late Secretary of the Treasury issued an order requiring the vouchers of Mr. Mullett, Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to be paid without submitting them either to the Auditors or the Comptrollers of the Treasury, whose duty under the law is to examine and pass upon all accounts. The Secretary issued that order against their protest, and for twelve months any payment which Mr. Mullett has seen fit to order has been made without the consent either of the Auditors or Comptrollers.

Mr. RANDALL. And the First Comptroller protested against it.

Mr. BECK. The First Comptroller did protest against it, as I am advised, but his protest was overruled. I understand that one of the first orders which the present Secretary has made was to rescind this order of his predecessor. Now, I want to know what guarantee we have had during the last twelve months of the honest payment or faithful disbursement of any money for the public buildings of the United States under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury requiring the money to be paid without the supervision and audit of the Auditors or Comptrollers? I think that Congress ought to provide against such orders being issued by any officer as this issued by the late Secretary of the Treasury, defining and setting aside of the jurisdiction and responsibility prescribed by law of the accounting officers of the Treasury. I think that all these past accounts should be inquired into and strictly scrutinized before any further payments are authorized to contractors or appropriations made for these works.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is the gentleman satisfied with the present head of the Treasury Department?

Mr. BECK. I am. At last, I think, you have a man of efficiency, ability, will, and courage at the head of that Department; one who will put down all these things. The other man I think was personally honest, but that is all that can be said for him, judging by his administration of the Treasury Department.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Gentlemen will observe that all the appropriations made in this bill are to be paid out under the direction and supervision of the officer in whom the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] expresses his confidence, and whose confidence in him I think is well placed. I do not know anything about the order of the Secretary of the Treasury to which the gentleman refers. I would like to ask him if that statement was made to him officially from the Treasury Department.

Mr. BECK. The question I asked the gentleman was if there is any account of the money heretofore expended for the construction of this building.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not know anything more about it than the gentleman himself. I suppose the proper officers who paid the money out have the vouchers, and can show them. If they cannot I will go as far as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to hold them to a strict accountability.

Mr. BECK. Is it not true that for the year past under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury the Comptrollers and Auditors have been deprived of all supervision over the accounts of this Supervising Architect?

Mr. RANDALL. Against law?

Mr. BECK. Yes; against law.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I cannot answer that question. But I say in regard to the expenditures made for the State, War, and Navy Department building, the Secretary of the Treasury has had nothing to do with it. Not one dollar of the expenditure has been made under his supervision or order. Every dollar of it has been expended under the direction of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has the entire control of it; has had control over every dollar of the expenditure from the commencement of the building. That I state upon my own knowledge.

Mr. BECK. Was there any law authorizing the order of the Secretary of the Treasury depriving the Comptrollers and Auditors of their right to supervise and revise the accounts of Mr. Mullett? If so, what law?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I have said to the gentleman that I know nothing about the order to which he refers; I never heard of it until he referred to it here. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasury Department have nothing whatever to do with the expenditure of money appropriated for the construction of this new State Department building. It has been expended under the direction and control of the Secretary of State. I venture to say on my responsibility that every dollar expended upon that building can be accounted for and proper vouchers exhibited for every cent.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask the gentleman from Virginia one question more?

Mr. COBURN. I cannot now, for I have not time. This debate has drifted away from the real point at issue, which is simply whether or not we will this year go on expending a large sum of money on this building, or whether we will postpone the expenditure for one year or for two years if necessary. We have already expended a large sum of money on the building, and it is now so far completed that we can very well stop work upon it; there will be no trouble at all about that. The buildings occupied now by the War and Navy Departments, as I said before, are good buildings. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] asked me whether or not there were other buildings used by the War Department that were not so good. Some of them are not. But there is one building used by the War Department, in which the most important records are now kept, called the Winder building, which is perhaps more secure against fire than the War Department building itself. So far they have got along with these buildings very well. We went through the pressure of the war, and have gone on until now with these buildings. In view of the stringency of the times it seems to me to be the part of good sense to stop further work on this building for the present. Let us wait until there is a greater surplus in the Treasury; let us wait until there is a greater demand or necessity for this building than at present.

Mr. SPEER. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the items for which this sum shall be expended.

Mr. BECK. I do not believe it to be the fact, as has been stated, that this money is expended under the direction of the Secretary of State; but if so, how can the Secretary of the Treasury account for the expenditure?

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Chairman, the expense of erecting this building for the Department of State is perfectly enormous—entirely beyond what it was thought it would be at the time its construction was begun, and entirely beyond what such a building should cost under any republican government. How can we justify expending for a building for the State and War Departments $10,000,000, a sum greater than it cost to carry on the two first Administrations of this Government?

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the statement is made publicly throughout the country—whether truly or not I do not say—that the stone of which this building is being constructed is taken from a quarry owned by a ring—a political ring, members of which belong to this House. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. PLATT, of Virginia,] where the stone for the State Department building is obtained, who owns the quarry, who is the president of the company? Give us the names of the members. It would relieve this House, and it might relieve Congress from a public scandal. I make no specific charges; I do not repeat names that have been published; but for the information of the House and in justice to the character of members, I call upon the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to state who compose this company and who owns these quarries. That should be stated in justice to us all.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] if I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Some three years ago the Committee on Appropriations, after a full consideration of the whole matter, under the lead of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] provided for erecting a public building to accommodate the War, State, and Navy Departments.

Mr. SPEER. I believe I had some time left, and I yielded it to the gentleman from Virginia to answer my question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was not aware of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] had one minute remaining.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I cannot undertake to answer in one minute a question that it took four minutes to ask.

Several MEMBERS. We will give you all the time you want.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask where the granite comes from that is put into this building, who owns the quarries, who is the president of the company owning them, and various questions of that kind. I understand the insinuation intended to be conveyed in the gentleman's words; and so far as I possess the information I will give it to him. When I have done this I shall ask the indulgence of the committee to add a few words, as my remarks must assume something in the character of a personal explanation.

The quarry from which is obtained the stone forming the superstructure of the State Department building is situated about two miles from Richmond, Virginia. The quarry from which is obtained the stone entering into the basement of the building is in the State of Maine; the exact location I do not know. The contractor for the stone used in the basement of the building is I believe the Bodwell Granite Company, of Maine. The contractor for the stone used in the superstructure is Mr. Alfred Ordway, of Richmond. Both contracts have been given out under competition; and each contractor was respectively the lowest bidder.

So far as I know the quarry from which the stone for the superstructure is being taken (and I would like to call the attention of members to the exceeding beauty of that stone—the Richmond granite) is owned entirely by the following parties: Mr. Ordway, a Baltimore gentleman named, I think, Andrews, and a Mr. Green, whose father owned the quarry for forty years. So far as I know, no other man owns a cent's worth of interest in that quarry, or is in any shape or manner connected with it. This is all the information I possess in regard to the ownership of those quarries.

It is proper for me to add in behalf of myself, as connected with this question, a few words of explanation. I do this in view of the manner and tone of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] and in view of the fact that two years ago, in the closing hours of the first session of the Forty-second Congress, a then colleague of mine from the State of Virginia (Mr. Porter) charged that I myself had a pecuniary interest in this contract. I demanded an investigation. You recollect, sir, (Mr. TYNER in the chair,) that at my demand the testimony of the witnesses mentioned by Mr. Porter was taken before the committee of which you were then the acting chairman. That testimony, I need not say to those gentlemen who knew of it, was sufficient to show clearly the correctness of my statement that I never had one way or another, directly or indirectly, any connection with this contract; that I never had one cent's worth of interest in it through myself or anybody else for my benefit or for the benefit of anybody connected with me. Any insinuation to the contrary is uncalled for and false. [Here the hammer fell.] Let me say one word more.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish to say that I did spend nearly two months of my time, working as actively as I knew how to work, to get the contract for the stone for the superstructure given to contractors from the State of Virginia. I went to Virginia with the officers who were to examine the quarries. I went to the State of New York to see the Secretary of State. I worked against the gentlemen who were trying to get the whole of the contract for their States, and I did for the interest of the State I represent everything I could do honorably as a member of Congress. They got the contract in Virginia, and it has been the means of expending for labor in that State a large amount of money in the last two or three years and given employment to a large number of men, and brought to the public notice one of the great industries and most valuable resources of that State which had hitherto been neglected and unknown. I did all I could, as I should do again under similar circumstances for the interest of my State, but no living man ever dared to offer to give me one cent of compensation for what I did or even whispered to me that I would be reimbursed the expenses I paid out of my own pocket in doing that work.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that this building, when authorized in 1871, was placed under the direction of the Secretary of State for the reason that that portion of it which the State Department was to occupy was needed first. The Secretary of State has had the entire charge of making all the estimates and recommendation concerning it, and for that purpose Mr. Mullett, the Supervising Architect has been under his direction.

Last year an appropriation was made sufficient nearly to build the State Department proper. The south wing, intended for the State Department, will be completed in the month of September. We have in this bill an appropriation sufficient to furnish it and put it in order; so by the time Congress comes here I hope the State Department will have abandoned its old rented building on Fourteenth street and be in its permanent home.

Last year we also appropriated for the work of finishing the State Department wing enough to begin the east wing, which is that portion facing the President's House. The basement and sub-basement are now laid, and the appropriation here is to continue the work so as to get one of the other Departments in.

There was an estimate sent to us for $1,500,000 by the Secretary of State. He recommended that amount to continue the east wing and lay the foundation for the north wing, but the Committee on Appropriations declined, in view of the necessities of the Treasury, to begin work on the north wing this year. We therefore cut down $800,000 from the estimate of the Secretary of State. We think $700,000 will be sufficient to carry on the work on the east wing. We hope the House will stand by the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. Have you any objection to my amendment, which provides for the report to Congress of the items of the expenditures?

Mr. GARFIELD. That report will be made in any event.

Mr. SPEER's amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. COBURN'S amendment; which was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture for the new building to be occupied by the State Department, $112,000, to be available immediately.

Mr. RANDALL. That is an extravagant appropriation, it seems to me. I move to strike out $112,000 and insert $50,000. I do not wish to discuss this, but it must be apparent to everybody that $112,000 is entirely too much to furnish that Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember the building is now a mere shell, and this is to provide gas-fixtures and everything in that way, carpets, furniture, plumbing, and everything of that kind, in order to fit it for use.

Mr. RANDALL. Show me the items which you have stated.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have a letter from the Secretary of State, and also a letter from the Supervising Architect.

Mr. RANDALL. Let them be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask the Clerk to read what I will send up. I will add before the letter is read that we inquired whether the furniture in the building now occupied by the State Department could not be used in some measure for furnishing the new State Department, and we found they had been using the old, almost worn-out furniture in the expectation of going into the new building. The Secretary of State informs us there is nothing in the way of furniture in that building which could be used in the new. The committee therefore recommend this appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 11, 1874.

SIR: In the preparation of the new State Department for occupation, an appropriation for the purchase of furniture will be necessary. A careful estimate has been prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and it is thought that $112,801 will be required. I have, therefore, the honor to request that you will bring the subject to the attention of the committee over which you preside, with a view to the necessary legislation thereon.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. That is in no respect an estimate in detail. It is a mere blind estimate of the appropriation necessary. If similar appropriations are made for the others, these three Departments, the State, War, and Navy Departments will cost for furnishing almost a half million dollars. I think we might as well halt here and give $50,000, which I think entirely adequate for the proper furnishing of the State Department. If we shall find hereafter that that sum has not been sufficient I shall be willing at a future time to vote for more money; but I do think that $50,000 is entirely sufficient for the purpose intended.

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S amendment, the Chair stated that on the vote by sound the ayes had it.

Mr. RANDALL. I must ask for a division. I look upon this as one of the most extravagant items in this bill.

A MEMBER. Make it $75,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to modify my amendment by making the amendment $75,000 if the committee will agree to that.

Mr. SPEER. Insist on your original amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S amendment, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEER. In what form was my colleague's amendment adopted? Is the amount $75,000 or $50,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to modify his amendment by making the amount $75,000. If, however, the vote was taken with any misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman, the Chair will allow the question to be again put to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. There was no misunderstanding on my part.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment has been agreed to as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture, and repairs of the same, and for carpets for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $200,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "$200,000" and inserting "$100,000."

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. This appropriation covers two hundred public buildings of the United States. I hope it will not be cut down.

Mr. RANDALL. We are endeavoring to economize in every direction so that we may not be driven to the necessity of imposing additional taxation. And yet here is resistance made to a reduction of an appropriation to be expended in supplying furniture to replace what might very well answer for another year in every one of these buildings. I hope the committee will sustain the amendment, and thus effect a saving of one-half the appropriation asked for to the extent of $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is utterly impossible to keep up the furniture, carpets, &c., in nearly two hundred public buildings without an average expenditure of about $1,000 each. I ask how far will $1,000 go for such a purpose in a building that cost $5,000,000? How far will $1,000 go in such a building as that in New York? There are one hundred and thirty-five buildings now under the actual control of the Supervising Architect, and there are a good many more finished of which he has only a general custody, making in all about two hundred buildings; and for so many buildings $200,000 is a small amount for this purpose.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to strike out the last word. The committee within the last hour have appropriated for furnishing a single building in the city of New York the sum of $200,000; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes that for the furnishing of all the other public buildings in the country two hundred in number, including the employment in a great number of rooms of a great number of people in Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, and everywhere else, we should cut the amount down to one-half the sum that is appropriated for a single building in the city of New York. That is unreasonable. I do not suppose that on the ground of so-called economy this House is to refuse to keep in repair these public buildings generally, and in a blindfold manner to cut down the estimate of the necessary expenditures, of an amount not exceeding what has been usual in previous years. This is not economy, Mr. Chairman, and I trust the House will not be led away by any cry of that kind into appropriating an entirely inadequate amount.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to this fact, that the item to which he has addressed his remarks does not provide for the employment of the large number of men he has spoken of. The next clause of the bill provides for "fuel, light, and water, and miscellaneous items required by janitors and firemen in the proper care of public buildings."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I was speaking only of furnishing.

Mr. SPEER. This item does not provide for the employment of a single individual. It is for furniture and repairs of same and carpets. Now are we to recarpet every year the public buildings of the country?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That is not what is proposed here. If they were all to be recarpeted it would take millions.

Mr. SPEER. I repeat that this appropriation does not pay for the services of a single man.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the amendment to the amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it. I wish to act on behalf of the Government just as I would act in a matter of this kind in my own personal affairs. Whenever I feel that I cannot in my own household renew my furniture because of the fact that I have not the money to do it I postpone it for a year; and so I want to act in reference to the Government. We are going into extravagant appropriations here for furniture. Now, the gentleman tells you that $200,000 was appropriated for furnishing the New York post-office and court-house. If I had been aware of that, sir, I should have endeavored to have that appropriation cut down, because I do not believe that it can be made available at all this year, that is to say, if it applies to the new building there. The new building at New York for the post-office and court-house will not be in such a condition this year that it will be necessary to expend any such sum of money in furnishing it.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing as one member of this House to vote $200,000 for this purpose, unless we have some itemized memorandum of what it is wanted for. A friend of mine was in Savannah a few days ago, and on visiting the barge office in the lower part of the town, near the river, he found in a small wooden house used as the office a highly carved black-walnut center-table and chairs to match, and the officer said that all the requisition they made was for a pine table. Now, if the money of the country is being spent in that luxurious way for a barge office, I think it is time that some one supervised the expenditures. In the custom-house at New Orleans and in other places throughout the country there is more extravagant furniture than there is in one-tenth of the private houses of the country.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is not black walnut the commonest wood used for that purpose?

Mr. MERRIAM. A carved black-walnut center-table, at a place where they made a requisition for a pine table, may be necessary in the view of my friend from Massachusetts; such a table may be necessary for his purposes, but not for public purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am sorry that the gentleman from New York was not observant when the appropriation for furnishing the New York post-office was passed upon. The estimate for furniture and carpets for that building was $375,000. The committee cut it down to $200,000. I am sorry that it was not thought proper by the gentleman from New York to make this assault upon expenditures of public money at that point, instead of on this appropriation for furnishing all the public buildings of the country.

Mr. CREAMER. I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me that a great many members on this floor will never get over the fact that the Government is putting up a public building in the city of New York. Ever since the organization of the Government you have had your post-office in the first city of the country in an old church, built in 1732. Your court-house in that city, as the gentleman from Massachusetts knows, because I believe he has been there quite frequently, has been for years past in an old theater. Your custom-house to-day is in a building sold to the Government by the merchants of the city, the old Merchants' Exchange. That city certainly has not at any time received any particular favor from Congress or the Government. Besides that, it must be borne in mind that the New York post-office is not a local concern; it is a national affair. So is our custom-house. Seventy per cent. of the entire revenues of the country are collected at that point; nearly two-thirds of the entire revenue that goes to pay the interest on your national debt and the expense of carrying on your Government. If $200,000 is an extravagant amount for the furnishing of that building, then reduce it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I did not object to that as being extravagant; not in the slightest degree; but I said that if that was only enough for one building, certainly this was not too much for several hundred buildings.

Mr. CREAMER. Pardon me; I did not intend to intimate that the gentleman had said anything of the kind. For Heaven's sake, sir, let us hear the last of this cry that New York is getting a large public building. It is the first city in the nation.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 41, noes not counted.

Mr. SPEER. Only seven republicans voted "ay."

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to reduce the amount to $150,000.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 46, noes 74; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The committee rose informally to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon their amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill of the House No. 3171, to amend the customs and revenue laws and to repeal moieties, and had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. SCOTT, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. BAYARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 311) for the relief of William J. McIntire;

A bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan;

A bill (H. R. No. 958) for the relief of Robert Sutherland;

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the honorable discharge from their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Ninth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (heavy,) and directing their honorable muster out of the service of the United States as of the date of their dismissal;

A bill (H. R. No. 1108) for the relief of Alfred Fry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1828) to further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of the officers of the Army and Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 2207) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2412) for the relief of Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private in Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2697) to create an additional major of artillery, and to promote Captain Thomas M. Robertson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2704) for the relief of Selden Connor;

A bill (H. R. No. 2901) for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 2939) to compensate D. M. Haggard for six months' service as colonel of the Fifth Kentucky United States Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2982) for the relief of Thomas Simms, late a lieutenant in the Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3001) for the relief of Peter J. Knapp;

A bill (H. R. No. 3002) for the relief of Isaac Riseden, late a first lieutenant of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 3003) for the relief of George A. Bacon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3183) for the relief of Jonathan D. Hale;

A bill (H. R. No. 3303) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3335) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company, Fort Gratiot, Michigan.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3257) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3428) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3431) authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona no longer required for military purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 323) for the relief of Charles W. Biere, late second lieutenant of the Eighty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers;

A bill (S. No 324) for the relief of M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers;

A bill (S. No. 344) for the relief of William Bowlin;

A bill (S. No. 345) for the relief of Alvis Smith:

A bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of Lieutenant John Shelton;

A bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of William M. Kimball;

A bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of John R. Polk;

A bill (S. No. 502) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Jackman and the legal representatives of Mrs. Martha Vaughn;

A bill (S. No. 574) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold;

A bill (S. No. 671) for the relief of Alexander Minor, of West Virginia;

A bill (S. No. 704) for the relief of the non-commissioned officers and men of the United States Army who were sufferers by the wreck of the bark Torrent;

A bill (S. No. 718) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Schwartz, deceased, late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (S. No. 757) to donate a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady to school district No. 1, in township of Sault Sainte Marie, and State of Michigan, for school purposes;

A bill (S. No. 769) for the relief of Major J. W. Nichols, paymaster United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Boyle;

A bill (S. No. 794) to legalize the muster of Reuben M. Pratt as second lieutenant;

A bill (S. No. 800) to amend the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1864;

A bill (S. No. 841) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry;

A bill (S. No. 854) extending the right of way heretofore granted to the Alleghany Valley Railroad Company through the arsenal grounds at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania;

A bill (S. No. 930) to authorize the Farmers' National Bank of Greensburgh, Pennsylvania, to change its location and name; and

A bill (S. No. 924) donating condemned cannon to the city of Masillon, Ohio, for monumental purposes.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and the consideration of the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all balances in the Treasury remaining unexpended on the 1st day of July, 1874, of appropriations heretofore made for buildings and sites of buildings named in this act, and all balances of appropriations heretofore made, and sufficient for the completion of buildings under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury not named in this act, during the next fiscal year, be, and they are hereby, made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that that provision changes existing law, because under the exising law these balances would be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. This merely renders available the balances remaining unexpended at the end of the year. It is the same as appropriating money; it is not a change of existing law.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The language is "that all balances of appropriations heretofore made, &c., be, and they are hereby, made available."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment to come in after the clause just read as a separate section:

SEC. 2. That all unexpended balances of money heretofore appropriated to carry out the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government," passed March 3, 1871, and to support the civil-service commission, so called, remaining at the close of the present fiscal year, are hereby ordered to be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the rules to have been suspended so as to make this amendment in order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to offer a substitute for the amendment just read. I believe debate on this subject has been closed.

Mr. GARFIELD. All debate was closed on the general subject of civil-service reform.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the Clerk to read the substitute which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871, authorizing the President to employ suitable persons to conduct certain inquiries and to prescribe their duties in respect to appointments in the civil service, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the unexpended balance of any appropriation heretofore made for carrying the same into effect shall be covered into the Treasury. And it shall be the duty of the officer at the head of each of the Executive Departments at Washington to prescribe and publish rules for ascertaining the qualifications of applicants for appointments at his disposal or made under his authority, to make such appointments only from candidates who have the qualifications of honesty, efficiency, and fidelity, and not as rewards for mere party zeal, giving preference only to those who have the additional qualification of an honorable record in the military or naval service of the United States; and it shall be his further duty to make such appointments as equitably as possible from qualified candidates presenting themselves from the several States and with reference to their population; and upon the removal of any appointee the reason for such removal shall be stated on the records of the Department where the service was rendered.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not that amendment divisible immediatety after the clause with respect to any unexpended balance?

Mr. KASSON. I think not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to have a division, because I can vote for the latter clause of the proposition.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let us have a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules, any gentleman is entitled to a division of the question where the subject-matter of the proposition is susceptible of division; and the Chair understands the test to be whether the part asked to be separately voted on would make a substantial proposition when standing alone. The Chair is of opinion that so much of this amendment as provides for covering into the Treasury unexpended balances would stand by itself, whatever disposition might be made of the remainder.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I call for a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] calls for a division of the question so that the vote shall be taken separately on the clause ending with the provision for covering any unexpended balance into the Treasury.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will accept that part as a portion of my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman cannot accept a part of this substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] can modify his amendment as he likes before any action of the Committee of the Whole has been had upon it.

Mr. KASSON. But I offer my proposition as a substitute; and I am entitled to a vote upon it as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will indicate his amendment as now modified.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I modify my amendment so as to embrace the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] down to and including the words "covered into the Treasury."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had the rules suspended so as to authorize him to propose a specific amendment. That amendment he has now withdrawn and proposes an entirely different one.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to suspend the rules did not embrace any particular form of amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let the Clerk read the authority under which the gentleman makes his motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

That when the House is in Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil expense bill it shall be in order for the Committee of the Whole to consider and pass upon an amendment in relation to the preference in Government employment of soldiers and sailors and their dependent relatives; and also in relation to diminishing and stopping the expenses of carrying on examinations by boards of commissioners and others traveling around the country at public charge, and the detailing of clerks of the Departments to sit in judgment upon their fellow-clerks, and to exercise thereby the appointing power which is by the Constitution vested in the heads of the several Executive Departments, who ought to be men of sufficient discretion to appoint their own clerks without being tied up by rules and regulations imposed upon them by a board composed in whole or in part of those very clerks themselves.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order that the proposition adopted yesterday and which has just been read does not provide for anything in regard to the repeal of the law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It it provides for "stopping expenses."

Mr. KELLOGG. But the proposition had no provision whatever in regard to the repeal of any law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman that unless we repeal the law somebody may go on under it and bring in a deficiency appropriation, which I do not want.

Mr. KELLOGG. I withdraw my call for a division of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. STORM. I renew the call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that a proposition "in relation to diminishing and stopping expenses of carrying on examinations by boards of commissioners" would cover an amendment repealing the very law which authorizes such expenditures.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I make this point of order: the gentleman from Massachusetts moved a suspension of the rules so that this amendment might be in order when the "sundry civil expense bill" should be under consideration. We have no such bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The proposition does not even define the year. It may be this year or next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] moved an amendment, and to that amendment the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has moved a substitute. The gentleman from Connecticut calls for a division of the vote on the substitute.

Mr. KELLOGG. I withdraw my call for a division.

Mr. STORM. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the gentleman is entitled to have a division of the vote on the substitute.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa a substitute for the whole amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa is a substitute to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BURCHARD. How, then, can it be divided, as it is an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any different rule applicable to an amendment in reference to the question of division that is not also applicable to the amendment to the amendment. The rule applying to the amendment also applies to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot understand how an amendment to an appropriation bill is divisible.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio point out any rule which makes a distinction in regard to amendments in the Committee of the Whole in reference to the question of a division of the vote?

Mr. GARFIELD. The motion to strike out any portion of an amendment is in order. I cannot see how an amendment in the Committee of the Whole is divisible. I do not know who has the right to ask for a division of the amendment, but it is in order to move to strike out any part of the amendment which may be pending.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. If anybody wishes to strike out any portion they can do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the rule read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If a vote be taken on the first half of the substitute, and it be adopted as a substitute, for the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, what then will be the next proposition?

Mr. COX. The other half of the substitute.

Mr. RANDALL. Is such a substitute in order in the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. A division of the amendment offered as a substitute is then an amendment in the third degree. Here we have an amendment offered to the bill and then a substitute for that amendment and then a division of that substitute which allows an amendment in the third degree, and that is contrary to the rule. A division of the amendment in the nature of a substitute and allowing a vote on one part and then allowing a vote on another is really an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

46. Any member may call for the division of a question, before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask the Clerk to read a passage from Barclay's Digest, on page 90.

The Clerk read as follows:

DIVISION OF QUESTIONS.

"Any member may call for the division of a question, before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible." (Rule 46.) But it has been decided on appeals that on motions to commit with instructions, or on the different branches of instructions, (Journals, 1, 17, page 507; 1, 31, pages 1395-'97; 1, 32, page 611,) on a Senate amendment, (Journals, 2, 32, page 401,) on an amendment reported as a single amendment from a Committee of the Whole, (Journals 1, 28, page 1061; 1, 29, pages 366, 642; 1, 30, page 1059; 2, 37, page 170, &c.,) on a series of resolutions proposed to be inserted in lieu of other matter, (Congressional Globe, 1, 31, page 1301,) a division of the question cannot be had.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The principle, if you will allow me to suggest, is this: suppose a series of resolutions is offered as an amendment to another series. That is not a divisible question. The single question is, shall this second series be inserted for the first? If inserted as an amendment then the question comes before the House when a division will be in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to cut this knot, and I will accept the whole as a substitute, and will then move to strike out the portion indicated.

Mr. HOSKINS. I understand the rule to be when a substitute is offered it must be acted on as a whole, and cannot be divided. I do not understand it precludes the amendment of the substitute. The substitute, I understand, is amendable, but not divisible.

Mr. COX. I move the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will sit here until after five o'clock.

Mr. COX. We cannot get through with this to-night.

The committee refused to rise.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now call for a division of the question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to strike out all of the first part of the amendment ending with the words "covered into the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to offer an amendment. Where it is provided that the appointments shall be made as equitably as possible from the candidates presenting themselves from the different States, I propose to strike out the word "States" and to insert the words "congressional districts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be first on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. What is that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] is to strike out from the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] certain words.

Mr. HOSKINS. I respectfully ask the Chair to state distinctly to the House what is to be voted upon. Gentlemen around me do not understand what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been for some time trying to do that very thing; and if gentlemen will take their seats he will make one more effort to do so.

The Clerk will read so much of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] proposes to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words:

That section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871, authorizing the President to employ suitable persons to conduct certain inquiries and to prescribe their duties, and in respect to appointments in the civil service, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the unexpended balance of any appropriation heretofore made for carrying the same into effect shall be covered into the Treasury.

The question being taken on Mr. KELLOGG'S amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOSKINS. I now move to strike out the balance of the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the words be read which the gentleman from New York moves to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the words which it is proposed to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it shall be the duty of the officer at the head of each of the Executive Departments at Washington to prescribe and publish rules for ascertaining the qualifications of applicants for appointments at his disposal, or made under his authority, to make such appointments only from candidates who have the qualifications of honesty, efficiency, and fidelity, and not as rewards for mere party zeal, giving preference only to those who have the additional qualification of an honorable record in the military or naval service of the United States. And it shall be his further duty to make such appointments as equitably as possible from qualified candidates presenting themselves from the several States and with reference to their population, and upon the removal of any appointee the reason for such removal shall be stated on the records of the Department where the service was rendered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it now in order to move to substitute something for that last part of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] moves to strike out certain words; the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to strike out and insert.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I claim the right to perfect that portion of the amendment before it is stricken out. I move to strike out the word "State" and insert the words "congressional districts."

Mr. FORT. I think the word "Territories" should be added.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "States" and insert the words "congressional districts;" so it will read:

And it will be his further duty to make such appointments as equitably as possible from qualified candidates presenting themselves from the several congressional districts and with reference to their population, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] proposes to strike out and insert. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] moves to amend the portion proposed to be stricken out. The question will be first on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] been voted on and adopted? I understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts accepted the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and that that was submitted to the committee and adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee do now rise. It is evident that we cannot get through the Choctaw business to-night.

The question being taken on Mr. STARKWEATHER'S amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the words which I propose to insert be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is an amendment in the third degree. We have not yet adopted the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] That is now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has been made the original amendment by being accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and is now pending as an original motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is an original amendment pending to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. GARFIELD. How can an amendment to an amendment have an amendment offered to it in the third degree?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts adopted that as his own amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the committee has not adopted it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now pending, and the Chair understands that it is capable of being amended if the majority of the committee so decide, and the question is whether they will so decide.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is whether the gentleman from Massachusetts can make fish of his amendment one instant and flesh of it the next; if he has any right to change the amendment which he has accepted before it is voted on?

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to move that the committee now rise, before the shades of evening prevail?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. FERRY of Michigan, and Mr. STEVENSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 600) for the relief of Captain James B. Thompson, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. HOSKINS. I believe I can get the committee out of this muddle. I believe the pending question is on my motion to strike out the balance of the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] which is now the original amendment. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to insert something in lieu of it. I accept his amendment, and make mine a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. MAYNARD. I renew the motion that the committee rise; it is late on Saturday evening.

The question was put, and on a division there were—ayes 33, noes not counted.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask now, first, that there may be a reading of the first motion to amend my substitute, which is all that is in order. The substitute being the first amendment, and the first amendment to that being now in order, I ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposed certain words as an amendment. The gentleman from Iowa offered another in nearly the same words.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair will pardon me a moment. The first substitute was for the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and which he afterward accepted. That became amendment number one, as accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, either he or the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS,] I do not know which, offers an amendment to that, and that is the only thing that can be voted on, because it is an amendment in the second degree.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit the Chair to have read at the Clerk's desk what it is proposed to strike out, the Chair will be very much obliged.

Mr. KASSON. That is what I desire.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all the original amendment after the words "covered into the Treasury" and insert:

That in the Bureaus and in all the Departments at Washington, whenever there shall be a number of applicants for employment therein, a soldier or sailor who fought in the line of duty in the war, a soldier or sailor's widow, wife, daughter, and mother respectively being such applicants, shall have preference in employment suited to each respectively, and the same rule shall be observed whenever discharges shall take place in the several Departments and Bureaus by reason of diminution of force therein respectively: Provided, That two of the relations above stated, either by blood or marriage, shall not have employment in any of said Departments or Bureaus at the same time.

Mr. KELLOGG. I now call for the reading of the words in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that are proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it shall be the duty of the officer at the head of each of the Executive Departments at Washington to prescribe and p ıblish rules for ascertaining the qualifications of applicants for appointments at his disposal or made under his authority, to make such appointments only from candidates who have the qualifications of honesty, efficiency, and fidelity, and not as rewards for mere party zeal, giving preference only to those who have the additional qualification of an honorable record in the military or naval service of the United States. And it shall be his further duty to make such appointments as equitably as possible from qualified candidates presenting themselves from the several congressional districts and with reference to their population, and upon the removal of any appointee, the reason for such removal shall be stated on the records of the Department where the service was rendered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary question. Is it parliamentary to presume by a motion in this House that the heads of Departments will not do their duty in appointing men for honesty and efficiency? What is the use of passing a law for that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised upon that point.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I ask that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] may be divided, so that we shall take a vote first on striking out and afterward on inserting.

Mr. KELLOGG. I submit that the motion is not divisible.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be put on striking out.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the point of order that the motion is not divisible.

Mr. KASSON. The rules declare that it is not divisible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. By the Constitution the appointing power is fixed irrevocably in the President, and there can be no restriction upon it by Congress or in any way. I ask that the Constitution of the United States may be read on that point.

Mr. KASSON. I object; that is in the nature of argument, and I object to debating this question in that way.

Mr. COX. I ask that the Constitution be read on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stands corrected; the motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

Mr. COX. I insist upon having the Constitution read.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is in the nature of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. COX. I do not propose to vote on this question until my point of order is respected by the Chair.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out and insert; and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes not counted.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were 15 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were not ordered.

The motion to strike out and insert was accordingly agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest that this should be further amended by inserting after the words "wives and mothers" the words "aunts and cousins in the first, second, third, and fourth degrees."

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I have an amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, Mr. TYNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DAWES reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBRIGHT: The petition of Permelia Brownfield, of Fayette County, Pennsylvania, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BIERY: The petition of workingmen in the Allentown rolling-mill, Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. duty on iron and steel, and for free banking, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BLAND: The petition of Silas Hedrick and others, of Dent County, Missouri, for the construction of a double-track freight railway from the Missouri River to tide-water, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of William Dickson and others, of the District of Columbia, for an amendment of the general incorporation law, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DONNAN: Resolutions of citizens of Dubuque, Iowa, in favor of the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at Dubuque, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of the grange organization of Woodville, Minnesota, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. McNULTA: A paper relating to the application of Miss Miller, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of the Fairmount Park Association of Philadelphia, for twenty condemned cannon for an equestrian statue of the late Major-General George G. Meade, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RICHMOND: The petition of citizens of the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of W. G. Moore and 87 others, of Youngstown, Ohio, for the passage of the bill to aid in the construction of the Continental Freight Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 15, 1874.

The Senate met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair,) and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented a memorial of Messrs. Hodges Bros., Alexander Brown, Hugh Jenkins & Co., William Fisher & Sons, and other bankers, manufacturers, and importers, of Baltimore, Maryland, protesting against a tax on sales of stocks, coin, bonds, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I present the petition of the Rev. Dr. Sampson, late President of Columbian College, James L. Howard, President of the American Baptist Publication Company, Henry G. Weston, President of the American Missionary Baptist Union, Rev. E. H. Gray, ex-chaplain of the Senate, and many other distinguished persons late in attendance at the Baptist anniversary held in Washington, asking Congress to aid the American Printing House for the Blind and the American University for the Blind. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of A. B. Battelle and George D. Evans, praying compensation for the hides and tallow of sixteen hundred beeves furnished the United States Army in West Virginia in 1862 under a contract with the Commissary Department and which it is claimed were reserved to them therein; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of importers, dealers, and workers of tin-plate, protesting against a change of the duty on tin-plate; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present resolutions in the nature of a petition, from the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the substance of which is more briefly expressed in one of the resolutions than I could hope to do it. They respectfully petition:

That the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States are earnestly requested to direct the holding of sessions during the coming recess of their respective Finance and Ways and Means Committees for the revision of the revenue laws, in order that while the amount of revenue now collected shall not be diminished, the collection of the same may be simplified by a change from ad valorem to specific duties wherever practicable, and by such alterations in the classification of merchandise as may be found desirable.

They also inform us that a special committee of five has been instructed to wait upon Congress to promote the passage of such a proposition. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT presented a memorial of merchants, bankers, and business men of Hollidaysburgh, Pennsylvania, and a memorial of merchants and bankers, &c., of Altoona, Pennsylvania, protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill which imposes a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALCORN presented a memorial of the board of levee commissioners for the counties of Bolivar, Washington, and Issaquena, Mississippi, praying the Government of the United States to take charge of and construct the levees of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

He also presented a memorial from the Louisiana engineers, asking aid in the construction of the levees of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Frank E. Sawyer, of Clark County, Alabama, praying military protection until he can dispose of his property and remove from said county; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Alabama, praying for the establishment of certain post-routes in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PRATT presented papers in relation to the application of Daniel G. Gallion, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Indiana Volunteers, for an allowance of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of George S. Coe, president of the American Exchange Bank; Robert Lenox Kennedy, president of the National Bank of Commerce; and fifty-five other banks and trust companies of New York City; and a memorial of merchants, importers, bankers, and business men of Troy, New York, protesting against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff and tax bill, which imposes a tax of $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent. on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Horace Clough, late of Company D, Sixth New Hampshire Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the petition of Mrs. Mary M. Kearney, widow of Surgeon John A. Kearney, United States Navy, who died in 1847, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a memorial of merchants, importers, bankers, and others, citizens of Richmond, Virginia, remonstrating against the passage of the twenty-ninth section of the tariff bill, which imposes a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, coins, and other securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I desire to say that the Committee on Indian Affairs have not been able to bring the bills reported by them to the consideration of the Senate, and there are some twenty of them on the Calendar, many of which are of great importance. I therefore ask the Senate to give me two hours on Wednesday next, after the conclusion of the morning business, for the consideration of those bills, provided an appropriation bill is not then before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that two hours be given to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs on Wednesday next at the close of the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we ought at this moment when the Senate is so thin to make an order of that sort. I hope the Senator will wait until the morning business is over.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am not particular as to that, but I hope the Senate will grant the Committee on Indian Affairs this indulgence.

Mr. RAMSEY. While this matter is before the Senate I desire to say that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have not had a day nor an hour this session, and I gave notice some day last week that I would to-morrow after the morning hour ask the Senate to give me some time to consider some very important and very necessary bills reported by that committee. I give notice that I shall renew that request to-morrow morning after the morning hour.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to give notice that after the business of the morning hour is through I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the House bill No. 2190 to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty. The bill has been pending in the Senate for a long time, and it ought to be considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to that.

Mr. CONKLING. He only gives notice of his intention to move to take it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course I do not object to that.

REPORT RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the memorial of C. K. Curtis and others, graduates of the Naval Academy, praying for a re-arrangement of their names on the official list of the Navy, so that they may take rank and precedence as determined by the date of their graduation, be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain, to report that we recommend that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair. That is the general opinion of the committee, and I suppose there will be no objection to its being so ordered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently appointed Messrs. FRELINGHUYSEN, WRIGHT, and THURMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. EDMUNDS stating that he did not wish to be on the committee as he was obliged to leave the city this evening to be absent two or three days.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 869) granting to the Wasatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2671) granting a pension to General A. C. Voris, have instructed me to report it back with the recommendation that it pass. There is a report made by the Committee on Pensions of the House which our committee adopt.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Mr. President, having been in the chair almost the entire session, bills which have been intrusted to my care by the Judiciary Committee I have been unable to dispose of, and I must now throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate for fifteen or twenty minutes for the purpose of making several reports and considering one or two bills which are of importance and ought to be passed, and would have been urged upon the Senate days before if I had not been in the chair. I send to the desk a number of bills which the committee report adversely and recommend be indefinitely postponed, because their substance is embodied in one of the bills which I shall ask the Senate to consider. I ask that their titles be reported.

There being no objection, the following bills were read by their titles, and indefinitely postponed:

The bill (H. R. No. 2443) to protect persons acting in the interests of the United States;

The bill (H. R. No. 3283) to amend the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice," passed June 1, 1872;

The bill (H. R. No. 3510) to amend the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice," passed June 1, 1872;

The bill (S. No. 799) to amend the act passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from the State courts;"

The bill (S. No. 137) relating to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases;

The bill (S. No. 190) amending and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice;"

The bill (S. No. 462) to further amend an amendatory act approved March 2, 1867, amending an act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from the State courts," approved July 27, 1866;

The bill (S. No. 390) to amend an act for the removal of causes in certain cases from the State courts, approved July 27, 1866;

The bill (S. No. 164) amending and construing the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts,' approved July 27, 1866;"

The bill (S. No. 136) to repeal the second section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1798," approved February 5, 1867; and

The bill (S. No. 258) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States," approved May 9, 1872.

PAPERS OF HEIRS OF SILAS DEANE.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2347) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Connecticut Historical Society certain papers on file as vouchers for the discharged claims of the heirs of Silas Deane have directed me to report it back favorably and ask for its present consideration. It is a short bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the Connecticut Historical Society the papers now on file in the Treasury Department as vouchers in support of the claims of the heirs of Silas Deane, it being understood that those claims have been fully satisfied and discharged; and that the heirs have transferred to the historical society all the papers of historical interest left by Silas Deane; but copies of the papers are to be left on file in the Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WRITS OF ERROR IN CRIMINAL CAUSES.

Mr. CARPENTER. I now ask the Senate to consider Senate bill No. 935.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that on the trial of any criminal cause in any circuit or district court of the United States, or in any court of any Territory of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, the defendant or defendants shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions, which may be settled on the trial or within ten days thereafter, and which is to be signed by the presiding judge or justice of such court, and be deemed to be a part of the record in such cause.

The second section provides that in any criminal cause in any circuit or district court of the United States in which any defendant or defendants shall be sentenced to death, the court shall fix a day, not less than thirty nor more than ninety days after such sentence shall be pronounced, for the sentence to be carried into execution; and any defendant or defendants so sentenced to death may remove the cause, by writ of error, to the Supreme Court of the United States, as matter of right, without giving bond or security, the writ to be issued and served as in civil causes, and after the service of such writ the execution of the sentence shall be stayed, and the Supreme Court is to proceed to hear and determine the writ of error according to law; and if the day fixed by the sentence in the court below shall have passed before the Supreme Court shall render judgment on the writ of error, and the judgment in the court below shall be affirmed, the Supreme Court is to fix the day, not less than thirty nor more than ninety days after such affirmance, when the sentence shall be carried into execution, and issue a warrant to the proper officer therefor.

The third section provides that in every criminal cause tried in any court of any Territory of the United States, or of the District of Columbia, in which any defendant or defendants shall be sentenced to death, the court shall fix a day, not less than thirty nor more than ninety days after such sentence shall be pronounced, for the sentence to be carried into execution; and any defendant or defendants so sentenced to death may remove the cause by writ of error to the supreme court of the Territory or the District of Columbia, as the case may be, as matter of right; and after the writ of error shall be served, all proceedings in the judgment in the court below shall be stayed, and the supreme court shall proceed to hear and determine the writ of error according to law; and if the supreme court shall affirm the judgment, and the day fixed by the court below for the execution of the sentence shall have passed before the judgment of affirmance shall be rendered, the supreme court is to fix a day not less than thirty nor more than ninety days after such affirmance, upon which the sentence shall be executed; and after such affirmance, the defendant or defendants may, by writ of error, and as matter of right, and without giving any bond or security, remove the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States, the writ to be issued and served as in civil causes; and after the service of the writ, the execution of the sentence shall be stayed, and the Supreme Court of the United States shall proceed to hear and determine the writ of error according to law; and if the judgment shall be affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the day fixed by the supreme court of such Territory, or of the District of Columbia, as the case may be, shall have passed before such affirmance in the Supreme Court of the United States, the last-named court is to fix a day, not less than thirty nor more than ninety days after such affirmance by the court, for the sentence to be carried into execution, and issue a warrant to the proper officer therefor.

The fourth section provides that in all criminal prosecutions, penal actions, or proceedings to enforce a penalty prescribed by law in any circuit or district court of the United States, in which any defendant or defendants shall be sentenced to imprisonment for one year or upward, or to a fine of $1,000 or upward; or in which there shall be a recovery for $2,000 or upward; or in any criminal prosecution, penal action, or proceeding to enforce a penalty prescribed by law in any court of any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, in which any defendant or defendants shall be sentenced to imprisonment for one year or upward, or to a fine of $1,000 or upward, or in which there shall be a recovery for $1,000 or upward, and the judgment, sentence, or recovery shall be affirmed by the Supreme Court of such Territory or the District of Columbia, as the case may be, in which criminal prosecution, action, or proceeding the defendant or defendants set up or relied upon the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, in defense, the defendant or defendants therein may apply to any justice of the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of error to remove such prosecution, action, or proceeding to the Supreme Court of the United States within one year from the time when final judgment was entered therein by the circuit or district court, or by the supreme court of the Territory or of the District of Columbia, as the case may be; and if the justice so applied to shall be satisfied that such defense was interposed in good faith, or that the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States were fairly involved in the judgment, and that the defendant or defendants so applying has or have been substantially prejudiced by the judgment, he is to allow a writ of error; and after service thereof, as in civil causes, all proceedings on such judgment are to be stayed, and the Supreme Court of the United States are to proceed to hear and determine the writ of error according to law.

The fifth section provides that at the time the writ of error shall be allowed in the cases mentioned in the next preceding section, or at any time thereafter, the Supreme Court of the United States, or any justice thereof, may admit the defendant or defendants to bail, in such sum as shall appear to be just, to answer and abide by such judgment therein; and upon giving such new bail, all bail required prior to granting the writ of error shall be discharged; or if the defendant or defendants be in actual custody, he or they shall be discharged upon giving such new bail; but if the defendant or defendants are at large on bail when the writ of error shall be allowed, the bail is not to be discharged by the allowance of the writ.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT COURT JURISDICTION.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from the State courts to the circuit courts of the United States, to report the same back, with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting what I send to the desk. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert:

That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States or a controversy between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign states, citizens, or subjects; and shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offenses cognizable therein. But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another in any civil action before a circuit or district court. And no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving such process or commencing such proceeding, except as hereinafter provided; nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover thereon if no assignment had been made, except in cases of promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant and bills of exchange. And the circuit courts shall also have appellate jurisdiction from the district courts under the regulations and restrictions prescribed by law.

SEC. 2. That any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, now pending or hereafter brought in any State court, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or in which the United States shall be plaintiff or petitioner, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different States, or a controversy between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, or a controversy between citizens of a State and foreign states, citizens or subjects, either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district. And when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different States, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district.

SEC. 3. That whenever either party, or any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants entitled to remove any suit mentioned in the next preceding section, shall desire to remove such suit from a State court to the circuit court of the United States, he or they may make and file a petition in such suit in such State court, before the final hearing or trial therein, for the removal of such suit into the circuit court to be held in the district where such suit is pending, and shall make and file therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, for his or their entering in such circuit court, on the first day of its then next session, a copy of the record in such suit, and for paying all costs that may be awarded by the said circuit court if said court shall hold that such suit was wrongfully or improperly removed thereto, and also for there appearing and entering special bail in such suit, if special bail was originally requisite therein, it shall then be the duty of the State court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no further in such suit, and any bail that may have been originally taken shall be discharged; and the said copy being entered as aforesaid in said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court; and if in any action commenced in a State court the title of land be concerned, and the parties are citizens of the same State, and the matter in dispute exceed the sum or value of $500, exclusive of costs, the sum or value being made to appear, one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants, before the trial, may state to the court, and make affidavit, if the court require it, that he or they claim and shall rely upon a right or title to the land under a grant from a State, and produce the original grant, or an exemplification of it, except where the loss of public records shall put it out of his or their power, and shall move that any one or more of the adverse party inform the court whether he or they claim a right or title to the land under a grant from some other State, the party or parties so required shall give such information, or otherwise not be allowed to plead such grant or give it in evidence upon the trial; and if he or they inform that he or they do claim under such grant, any one or more of the party moving for such information may then, on petition and bond as hereinbefore mentioned in this act, remove the cause for trial to the circuit court of the United States next to be holden in such district; and any one of either party removing the cause shall not be allowed to plead or give evidence of any other title than that by him or them stated as aforesaid as the ground of his or their claim; and the trial of issues of fact in the circuit courts shall, in all suits except those of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be by jury.

SEC. 4. That when any suit shall be removed from a State court to a circuit court of the United States, any attachment or sequestration of the goods or estate of the defendant had in such suit in the State court shall hold the goods or estate so attached or sequestered to answer the final judgment or decree in the same manner as by law they would have been held to answer final judgment or decree had it been rendered by the court in which such suit was commenced; and all bonds, undertakings, or security given by either party in such suit prior to its removal shall remain valid and effectual notwithstanding said removal; and all injunctions, orders, and other proceedings had in such suit prior to its removal shall remain in full force and effect until dissolved or modified by the court to which such suit shall be removed.

SEC. 5. That if, in any suit commenced in a circuit court, or removed from a State court to a circuit court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed thereto, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act, the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require, and shall make such order as to costs as shall be just; but the order of said circuit court dismissing or remanding said cause to the State court shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court on writ of error or appeal, as the case may be.

SEC. 6. That the circuit court of the United States shall, in all suits removed under the provisions of this act, proceed therein as if the suit had been originally commenced in said circuit court, and the same proceedings had been taken in such suit in said circuit court as shall have been had therein in said State court prior to its removal.

SEC. 7. That whenever in any criminal prosecution, or penal action, or proceeding to enforce any forfeiture or penalty prescribed by law, now pending, or that may hereafter be commenced in any State court, the guilt or innocence of the defendant, or the case made by the prosecution or defense therein, shall depend upon the Constitution of the United States, or any act of Congress or treaty made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States or involve or depend upon the construction thereof; or where the case or the defense in such prosecution, action, or proceeding shall be one arising in whole or in part under the Constitution or laws of the United States or treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, any one or more of the defendants in such prosecution, action, or proceeding may remove the same to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which the same is pending at any time before final trial therein; and the circuit court to which the same shall be removed shall proceed in such prosecution, action, or proceeding according to law, and as if it had original jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 8. That any one or more of the defendants in any prosecution, action, or proceeding mentioned in the next preceding section, desiring to remove the same as aforesaid, may make and file a petition in such prosecution, action, or proceeding, in such State court, for the removal of such prosecution, action, or proceeding into the circuit court to be held in the district where the same is pending, and make and file therewith a bond, with good and sufficient surety, to be approved by the judge of the circuit or district court of the United States for said district, or by any commissioner appointed by either of said courts, both as to surety and amount, conditioned that he or they will file in the circuit court of the United States for the proper district on the first day of its then next session, a copy of the record in said prosecution, action, or proceeding, and appear and enter into bail for his or their appearance in said circuit court, as said court may require, whereupon the said State court shall proceed no further in said prosecution, action, or proceeding, and all bail for appearance required in said State court in such prosecution, action, or proceeding shall be discharged; or any one or more of the said defendants, desiring to remove such prosecution, action, or proceeding as aforesaid, may exhibit to the judge of the circuit or district court of the United States for said district, or to any justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, a petition for the removal of the same, stating the nature of the case and verifying the same by his or their affidavit; and if said judge or justice shall be of opinion that the case is removable under this act, he shall make an order thereon directing the same to be filed in the office of the clerk of said circuit court; and on the filing of the same in said clerk's office, with said order indorsed thereon, the said case shall be entered and docketed in said circuit court; and said clerk shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causâ, a copy of which shall be delivered to the clerk of said State court, or left at his office, by the marshal of the United States for said district, or his deputy, or some person duly authorized thereto by said marshal; and said marshal, or his deputy, or such person as shall be authorized as aforesaid, shall tender to the clerk of said State court his legal fees for a copy of the record in such prosecution, action, or proceeding; and thereupon said clerk shall deliver to said marshal, or his deputy, or person authorized as aforesaid, a copy of such record, and he shall file the same in the office of the clerk of said circuit court; and upon service of said writ as aforesaid upon said clerk of the State court, it shall be the duty of said State court to stay all further proceedings in said prosecution, action, or proceeding; and the said prosecution, action, or proceeding shall be deemed and taken to be removed to said circuit court; and the same shall thereafter be proceeded in only in said circuit court; and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein in the State court shall be wholly void. And if the said defendant or defendants so petitioning shall be in actual custody, it shall be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the said writ of habeas corpus cum causâ, to take the body or bodies of said defendant or defendants into his custody, to be dealt with in the said prosecution, action, or proceeding, according to the rules of law, and the order of the said circuit court, or the judge thereof in vacation. And all attachments made upon the property of any of the defendants, and all bail and other security given by any of the defendants in said prosecution, action, or proceeding in the State court prior to the removal, shall be and continue in like force and effect as if the same had been given in said prosecution, action, or proceeding after its removal to the said circuit court.

SEC. 9. That in all causes, civil or criminal, removable under this act, if the term of the circuit court to which the same is removable, then next to be holden, shall commence within twenty days after filing the petition and bond in the State court for its removal, then he or they who apply to remove the same shall have twenty days from such application to file said copy of record in said circuit court and enter appearance therein; and, if done within said twenty days, such filing and appearance shall be taken to satisfy the said bond in that behalf; that if the clerk of the State court in which any cause, civil or criminal, shall be pending, shall refuse to any one or more of the parties or persons applying to remove the same a copy of the record therein, after tender of legal fees for such copy, said clerk so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof in the circuit court of the United States to which said prosecution, action, or proceeding was removed, shall be punished by imprisonment not more than one year, or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or both, in the discretion of the court. And the circuit court to which any cause, civil or criminal, shall be removable under this act shall have power to issue a writ of certiorari to said State court, commanding said State court to make return of the record in any such cause removed as aforesaid, or in which any one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants have complied with the provisions of this act for the removal of the same, and enforce said writ according to law; and if it shall be impossible for the parties or persons removing any cause, civil or criminal, under this act, or complying with its provisions for the removal thereof, to obtain such copy, for the reason that the clerk of said State court refuses to furnish a copy, on payment of legal fees, or for any other reason, the circuit court shall make an order requiring the prosecutor in any criminal prosecution or penal action or proceeding to enforce forfeiture or recover penalty as aforesaid, to file a copy of the indictment, presentment, or other paper or proceeding by which the same was commenced, within such time as the court may determine; and in default thereof the court shall dismiss the said prosecution, action, or proceeding; but if said order shall be complied with, then said circuit court shall require the other party to plead, and said prosecution, action, or proceeding shall proceed to final judgment; and if the cause be of a civil nature, at law or in equity, the said circuit court may make an order requiring the parties thereto to plead de novo; and the bond given, conditioned as aforesaid, shall be discharged so far as it requires copy of the record to be filed as aforesaid.

SEC. 10. That when in any civil suit, commenced in any circuit court of the United States, to enforce any legal or equitable lien upon, or claim to, real or personal property within the district where such suit is brought, one or more of the defendants therein shall not be an inhabitant of or found within the said district, or shall not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such absent defendant or defendants to appear, plead, answer, or demur, by a day certain to be designated, which order shall be served on such absent defendant or defendants, if practicable, wherever found, and also upon the person or persons in possession or charge of said property, if any there be; or where such personal service upon such absent defendant or defendants is not practicable, such order shall be published in such manner as the court may direct, not less than once a week for six consecutive weeks; and in case such absent defendant shall not appear, plead, answer, or demur within the time so limited, or within some further time to be allowed by the court, in his discretion, and upon proof of the service or publication of said order, and of the performance of the directions contained in the same, it shall be lawful for the court to entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the hearing and adjudication of such suit in the same manner as if such absent defendant had been served with process within the said district; but said adjudication shall, as regards said absent defendant or defendants without appearance, affect only the property which shall have been the subject of the suit and under the jurisdiction of the court therein, within such district. And when a part of the said real or personal property against which such proceedings shall be taken shall be within another district, but within the same State, said suit may be brought in either district in said State: Provided, however, That any defendant or defendants not actually personally notified as above provided may, at any time within one year after final judgment in and suit mentioned in this section, enter his appearance in said suit in said circuit court; and thereupon the said circuit court shall make an order setting aside the judgment therein, and permitting said defendant or defendants to plead therein on payment by him or them of such costs as the court shall deem just; and thereupon said suit shall be proceeded with to final judgment, according to law.

SEC. 11. That process to commence in any circuit court of the United States, or in any court of any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, any civil suit or proceeding not affecting the title to real estate not within the State, Territory, or district where said suit is brought, against any corporation or other person residing in the United States and doing business in the State, Territory, or district where said suit is brought, and having in said State, Territory, or district where said suit is brought, an agent or agents in respect of the business or matter out of which the case arises, may be made by delivery to such agent, or to either of such agents where there is more than one, a copy of such process; and such service shall have the same force and effect as if made upon the principal of such agent in the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, where the suit is brought: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to any suit on a cause of action accruing before July 1, 1874.

SEC. 12. That whenever either party to a final judgment or decree which has been or shall be rendered in any circuit court has died or shall die before the time allowed for taking an appeal or bringing a writ of error has expired, it shall be necessary to revive the suit by any formal proceedings of revival, the representative of such deceased party may file in the office of the clerk of such circuit court a duly certified copy of his appointment and thereupon may enter an appeal or bring a writ of error as the party he represents might have done. If the party in whose favor such judgment or decree is rendered has died before appeal taken or writ of error brought, notice to his representatives shall be given from the supreme court as provided in case of the death of a party after appeal taken or writ of error brought.

SEC. 13. That sections 11 and 12 of the act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," approved September 24, 1789; and section 67 of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof," approved July 13, 1866, so far as the same relates to the removal of causes from State courts to the circuit courts of the United States; and the act entitled "An act amendatory of an act entitled 'An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases,'" approved January 22, 1869; and section 2 of the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security, and for other purposes,'" approved July 27, 1868; and section 20 of the act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1870; and sections 15 and 16 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 31, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871; and the act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July 27, 1866; and the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts,' approved July 27, 1866," approved March 2, 1867; and the act entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July 27, 1866,' approved March 2, 1867," approved March 30, 1872; and section 2 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789," approved February 5, 1867; and section 13 of the act entitled "An act to further the administration of justice," approved June 1, 1872; and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act, or providing for the removal of causes from State courts, or defining the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall affect any cause now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, nor any cause pending in or removed to a circuit court of the United States prior to the time when this act shall take effect. And no right acquired or vested under the provisions of any of the acts or parts of acts hereby repealed prior to the time when this act shall take effect shall be affected by the provisions of this act.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to strike out the eleventh section of the amendment. This section authorizes service upon a defendant by a delivery of a copy of the process to his agent engaged in the business or matter out of which the cause of action accrued with a certain exception, that it shall not apply to any action in respect to real estate where the real estate lies outside of the jurisdiction in which the suit is brought. That is the only limitation on the section. It therefore applies to all personal actions of every kind and description, and allows, if not technically, yet substantially substituted service in all such cases. There are many cases in which such substituted service, speaking not technically, the lawyers of the Senate will understand me, but practically, it is allowed by the statute laws of a State, and very properly allowed. For instance, in the State from which I come the statutes require foreign railroad companies and foreign insurance companies doing business in Ohio, that is, railroad companies having leased lines or owning lines in Ohio, to name some agency, have some office or place of business where service may be made upon the company; and so in regard to insurance companies. The law requires an insurance company to have an office and some person there to receive service in an action against the company upon any person of its policies granted to a citizen of Ohio, and insuring property within Ohio. To that I do not object; that is entirely right; and if this section were limited to cases of that kind, I should not object to it. But this section is unlimited except in the particular which I mentioned, and therefore it affects actions of tort as well as actions ex contractu. It applies to all personal actions whatever; and for that reason, without specifying the personal actions to which it would apply, I have never been able to give my assent to the section, and I have therefore moved to strike it out.

Mr. CARPENTER. I believe this section met the concurrence of all the members of the Judiciary Committee except the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and this bill makes the identical provision as to Federal courts which he says is the law of his State as to State courts. It is as just in one jurisdiction as it is in the other. If a railroad company or a life insurance company establishes an office in Milwaukee and issues policies to subscribers there and one dies, why should not the suit be brought there and service be made upon the agent who transacted the business and who is in substance the principal?

Mr. THURMAN. Our statute of Ohio does not go anything like as far as this. It does not embrace all personal actions.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then it does not go quite far enough; but the principle is sound as far as it does go, and there is no reason why it should not extend to the Federal courts. I hope the Senate will stand by the section.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, the transportation resolutions.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the pending order be postponed until this bill be finished. It will take but a short time.

Mr. WINDOM. Let this go on by consent for a few minutes as it is important. Let the regular order be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid aside informally if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAYARD. I think, Mr. President, this section is decidedly objectionable. It proposes an extension of constructive service of process on defendants beyond anything which we have had heretofore in the way of legislation. It is, in my opinion, dangerous and violative of the general principle that under our system makes personal actions local. Although it is true that there is capacity that is transitory in most personal actions, nevertheless the Constitution of the United States and the policy of the Government of the United States is to procure trials where the facts are best known.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. I have hardly got into my statement of facts yet, but I will answer if I can.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is just in support of that theory that this section is inserted. A corporation, for instance, goes out to Wisconsin, establishes a railroad office there, and does business in that State. There the facts occur; there the cause of action arises; there the witnesses reside; there the trial should be. The section would put it there. Strike out the section, and you may try it at New York.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator be willing to limit the operation of this section to corporations and to actions ex contractu?

Mr. CARPENTER. No. If a railroad company by sheer negligence runs its car off the track and breaks my leg, that is a tort, and I would not let them off on that account.

Mr. BAYARD. Would the Senator agree to limit this to corporations?

Mr. CARPENTER. No. I am not unfriendly to corporations; I would not subject them to any hardship that I would not individuals. I want to make the law apply to all persons.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I will proceed to state my objection. It is a maxim much older than any law known to us, "strike, but hear;" and that every man should have his day in court is essential; and that he must be brought into court by due notice is essential. The common reason why judgments of courts of other jurisdictions are disregarded and declared invalid in the jurisdictions where they are sought to be enforced is generally based upon the fact that there was not sufficient notice to the party who is to be charged, and that he had not in the full meaning of the term his day in court.

In my opinion the danger of this proposition is that under the general word "agent" you allow a party living no matter how remote from the scene of trial to be brought into court by this constructive notice upon him through his agent; and that is allowed in regard to an agent for the special case. This construction of agency is of itself a matter of very doubtful fact and difficult of ascertainment. The agency here is not required to be constituted in any manner. An attorney is sometimes an agent. No language is required generally to constitute an agent. It is too vague. Here you establish in the absence of a party defendant the fact of an agency, which he cannot know you are alleging. He might have under this law a judgment recovered against him in his absence, without his knowledge; for you have made no provision for the communication to him of the fact of the suit or the character of the claim. I can see under a law as vague as this the greatest hardship. I see in it the compulsion of men to defend suits in distant Territories working great hardships and far exceeding anything for which as yet we have legal precedent.

When corporations were created—vague, impalpable persons, merely artificial, acting only by agents—it was necessary to make constructive service of process by permitting a director or some other member of the corporation to be capable of having service made upon him for it. But never yet have I heard that this vague doctrine of agency was extended to other parties, or even to corporations, so that enormous judgments may be obtained against a party in the name of his agent, the real party having neither knowledge nor means of knowledge of the suit. A director has official position, has official duty to his corporation, and therefore upon him service of process may properly be made. He is a part of the corporation, and unless you provide that some actual person should be served with process it would be impossible for you to conduct suits against corporate bodies. Therefore the law has permitted the agencies of corporations, their officia servants, to be capable of receiving service of process that shall bind the principal or bind the corporation which they represent. But when has it ever been stated that a mere agency for one purpose shall allow a man to take a power which is equivalent here to entering into a cognovit actionem for the purpose of confessing judgment, for such would be in effect the result of this section. Take the case of a man doing business in the District of Columbia. He comes here and employs some one as an agent; that is to say, he talks to him about his affairs, and he gives him certain charge over his business; he consults with him; he says to his contractor, "Leave that note at the house of A B for me," or "See A B on the subject of my affairs." A B may really not be any one whom he trusts. He may give him no powers on earth to act for him; he has nothing to show that he is authorized to accept service, or to enter into contracts, or to submit matters for arbitration, or any thing of the kind; but under this section, if it can be shown that he has been held out by A B to be the agent of A B in any way, then a service may be made upon him which he may keep secretly from the alleged principal until damages in a large amount, either arising from tort or from contract, shall be found against him; and he will find a judgment brought into a United States court which shall be declared under this act to be valid and binding because service has been made upon him constructively and he has been constructively brought into court. Sir, there is a world of danger in this; there is a large possibility of oppression.

It certainly is reasonable that where you desire to sue a party, you should sue him at his home; go to his domicile; find him out; lay your suit upon him. If you can find him in transitu in another State, serve your process upon him. There surely is large enough opportunity in all this. I say to the Senate that this is a dangerous proposition; it is one that will lead to disastrous results; it is one that will lead to the collusion of men, who will set themselves up as agents for the purpose of procuring the condemnation of others to whom they are not friendly.

The service of process upon a private man, or upon a copartnership, or upon an association incorporated by law is carried far enough when you make it a service upon the officials of the corporation or upon the partner or upon the person doing buisness and having a local habitation and a name within the district and within the jurisdiction where you propose to bring your suit and recover your judgment. It is a large extension of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, it is a dangerous extension of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, it is an extension that is without precedent in the laws of Congress; and I trust the Senate will agree to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to strike out this section. There is no necessity for it.

If you tell me of the intangibility of corporations, then I say provide for them, if you please, by allowing service to be made in any State or Territory upon any member of the corporation; but do not go so far as to allow this statement of a man being the agent of another for any particular matter to bind that man irrevocably, so that a judgment recovered without his personal knowledge shall be incapable of resistance or defense. There is too much in this thing already; I would carefully guard the rights of absent men. This bill not only does not guard them, but it subjects them to the operation of a law which I see is harsh, and which I know will be used for mischievous ends. Therefore it is that I trust this section will be stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have listened with great surprise to the honorable Senator from Delaware. His strictures would disparage the practice and proceedings in my own State and those of every State in this Union which I know anything about. He holds up to us the truth that an agent upon whom process is served in a civil case may collude with the plaintiff, put the process in his pocket, and suffer judgment to go against his principal. Yes, sir; and I can tell the Senator of unnumbered illustrations of the same thing in the jurisprudence of the State of New York; and what is the answer? There are a great many. One answer is that no plaintiff with a claim which he wanted to recover would be fool enough to do any such thing. Why? Because a mere suggestion being made to the court, after judgment recovered of the principal, that he had not had notice of the service would instantly and inevitably set the judgment aside; and as my friend from Wisconsin suggests, in case of collusion a court of equity would set it aside also.

Again, what is a partner? Nothing but an agent. A partner is the general agent of his copartners; and the logic of my friend would be that process to commence a civil suit must be served upon all the members of a firm or voluntary association, because one might cheat the other and not allow him to know anything about it.

Mr. President, what is the section that the Senator wants to strike out? A section under which no action whatever can be brought that cannot be brought now, a section under which no action can be brought anywhere except exactly where it may be brought now. It has nothing to do with the venue, the place of trial, the rights of the parties, or any other matter or thing save one. What is that? If a railroad company cast me from its train here in this District or near by, I being a resident of the District, and break my leg; in place of being compelled to lie in wait until I can catch here some officer of that company upon whom technically no process can be made, within three or six years or during my life, and sue him here, I may go to the legally authorized agent of this company and hand my process to him.

Mr. BAYARD. The statute of limitations I believe never runs against an absent party.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say that it did.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator spoke about three or six years and intimated that if he did not catch him in that time his action would not lie at all.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend is very sharp. I did not intimate any such thing.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I misunderstood the remark certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend did misunderstand me, and I think he misunderstands this section very much. I restate my proposition: If I live long enough to catch an officer of this railroad here upon whom service can be made under the statute as it now stands, I may sue him. Under this section I may do exactly the same thing, neither his rights nor mine being changed except that when I find a business office here and find a superintendent or a treasurer there or whatever he may be, I go and hand my declaration and summons to him. That is all there is of it.

So an insurance company located in the city of New York insures my house in Washington and the house burns down. I have received my policy here from the agent. Here is his sign up, "So and So, agent of such an insurance company." My house burns up. "Will you pay me?" "No." "Why?" "Well, the company refuses to pay." Then I cast about to know what I am to do. I can sue them here; I ought to sue them here, but I must lie by and wait until the president or the executive officer of that company shall show his face in the District of Columbia; and then if I am ready I hand the paper to him and my suit is on foot. Is there any reason in that? Is there any sense in that? This section, I think, is too narrow and restricts the service to a suit commenced about the very business or matter in which the agency exists. I think that is too narrow and restricted. The section would have been better if it allowed service to be made absolutely upon an authorized agent. But the Senator from Delaware says that the agent may not have been employed with that view. When we put the law upon the statute-book, the agent will be employed with that view, and if any man has employed a lunatic or an idiot who when a paper is served upon him does not know enough to notify upon his principal, the principal probably will change that agent and he has time to change him under this section, and he probably will do it.

I do not want to prolong this discussion. This section as I understand was agreed to in committee by every member of the committee save one; and I had no expectation until now that there would be any objection to it. I leave the subject with one remark. The Senator spoke about corporations. I know it is very fashionable to denounce corporations and always has been. It is not a fashion which I observe. I do not think the Senator from Delaware means to do it, as a rule; but I know of no reason on earth why a corporation should be visited as other people are not. Perhaps if anybody were to object to this, I should have as much reason to do it as matter of local duty as anybody; because here from the city of New York are a large number of persons carrying on branch houses, selling everything in the world from the largest thing to a tooth-pick—clothing, wines, liquors, whatever you please. If I here purchase at one of these Washington establishments representing not a corporation but a firm or individual, and I am swindled, or I am charged for goods that I do not receive, or I sell goods to them for which they refuse to pay, what is the reason why I should not serve my process here just as much as I would be permitted to do if the principal at home were technically a corporation in place of being an individual or firm? I submit there can be no reason whatever, and this section is right, affecting no matter concerning the place of trial, no right of any party, but simply doing what is universal in the State of New York and everywhere else as far as I know within the State jurisdictions, to wit, enabling a party who has a right of action at a particular place to do that technical thing called the service of process in order to commence his action; that is all.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Did I understand the Senator from New York to say that if the president of a foreign corporation was off in another jurisdiction service could be made on that corporation by serving him? For instance——

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator. He need not "for instance" in order to have me understand that. I meant to say this, and that there need be no mistake about it I will repeat it as emphatically as I know how, that whatever the law is remains the law under the eleventh section with this solitary exception: In place of lying in wait for the president, for the officer, with a notice to appear at the place, if that president has a vicegerent there, an agent, an incarnation of that corporation, whatever his title may be, then you may serve the paper on him; that is all. If the Senator will put to me a case where if the president of a corporation or a member of a partnership or an individual coming into the district would not be suable, in place of speculating with him upon that case, I simply say to him that the eleventh section has nothing under heaven to do with it.

Mr. THURMAN. I only asked the question for the purpose of saying that if the Senator meant to assert that the president of a corporation, say, for instance, a corporation created by and domiciled in the State of New York, carries his official character with him wherever he goes, so that that corporation can be sued by serving process upon him——

Mr. CONKLING. My friend need not trouble himself about that. My friend states the law altogether too widely, if he will pardon me. The highest court in New York has decided that notice to a director sitting in a board of directors is not notice to a bank. Therefore I will agree with the Senator if he goes further than he did in his position, and I made no observation in conflict with it. I accomplish my purpose by begging the attention of the Senate to the fact that this section affects nothing except the mere matter of serving process in a civil action. It does not enable any party to bring a suit that he cannot bring to-day, to bring it anywhere where he may not bring it to-day, or to do anything in regard to it which he may not do now; but it simply cures a difficulty of enabling him to make service upon an agent without lying in wait until some other person who may be technically the proper person comes to the place and then sue him. That is all there is of it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think this section in one respect is too broad. If it were confined to corporations alone, I should be disposed to vote for it; and with a view to accomplish my purpose I move to strike out in line 6 the words "or other person." It is well known to every observing person that corporations in this country are increasing in number and multiplying in the varieties of business that they carry on.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator, are not individuals somewhat increasing in number in this country also?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not know that that question ought to be answered. It is so manifest that it answers itself.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought the Senator's idea seemed to be that increase was peculiar to corporations.

Mr. MERRIMON. Corporations are generally composed of a great number of persons. They conduct their business in many States, frequently at the same time in distant States, and it would be very inconvenient for any person injured by them in one State to have to go sometimes many hundred miles to sue and to seek their remedy in States where the corporations are located and doing business.

I think this section may be proper enough so far as corporations are concerned, but I think it is very inappropriate, it is very wrong indeed, when it takes in individual persons, natural persons. Take the case of a merchant in New York. He happens to be in the State of Wisconsin. He enters into a contract there. He is there temporarily doing business. Having done his business, he goes home. In the course of the next month or the next year, he sends an agent out into Wisconsin to sell goods or do some other thing. He goes there with a special purpose. While he is there, because he is the agent of the merchant who went there to transact business on a former occasion, he is sued in a United States court a thousand miles away from his home. I think that is wrong, and therefore I move to amend the section by striking out the words "or other person."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That ought not to be done.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not wish to take any time in debate. That would be the most unreasonable amendment I think that could possibly be made. The idea of making one law for corporate persons and another law for natural persons in regard to the manner in which suits shall be brought, is enough to drive any lawyer into the hydrophobia.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think it is the very thing that ought to be done. They stand on entirely different ground. One is a natural person, an individual; the other is a corporation composed of many persons, an ideal being, and process is to be served upon the agents, and treasurers and directors are only agents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will not strike out these words. The committee have framed this section upon precisely the principle of the law of almost every State in the Union; that is, to compel people to respond to just demands for contracts and things of that kind in the places where the citizens with whom they are doing business reside. It is no hardship upon anybody, and involves no new principle. I hope the Senate will reject the amendment and stand by the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] which is to strike out the eleventh section of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the section in line 3 after the words "civil suit," by inserting the words "ex contractu."

Mr. THURMAN. It has been amended by putting in "or proceeding."

Mr. BAYARD. Then it should be after "proceeding," which I understand has been interpolated by an amendment already made. The section will then read:

That process to commence in any circuit court of the United States, or in any court of any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, any civil suit or proceeding ex contractu not affecting the title to real estate, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make one remark upon that amendment. It confines it to cases ex contractu. We understand that. Under the section as so amended, if I were to sell in the District of Columbia, for example, a keg of nails to a railroad company, I could make service in a suit for that; but if my child or if I myself am run over and run down carelessly or willfully by a steam locomotive and maimed or killed, no action could be commenced because it is not ex contractu.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to strike out the eleventh section.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desire to say one word. The laws of the different States, of the different localities, can and do authorize the service of process in all proper cases, and therefore there is no loss of justice, and the Senator from New York would not be compelled to lose the chance of his three or six years, as he first stated it, or of his life-time, as he subsequently put it, in waiting for some stray officer of the corporation to pass by in order to make service, because he could have the process of the jurisdiction where the matter more properly belongs under State law as now existing. Another effect of this section is that it tends to increase the Federal jurisdiction, a matter which I do not at all desire.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Saulsbury, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Tipton, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—40.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Jones, Logan, Ransom, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, and West—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer the following amendment to be added to the eleventh section:

Provided further, That any judgment recovered where process has been served in the manner herein provided shall be opened and the defendant let in to a new trial, upon an affidavit filed by him that he had no notice of such service in time to make defense to the suit, and that he verily believes he has a just and legal defense to the whole or a part of the cause of action of said suit.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is equivalent to saying in every case a man shall have two trials.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is very proper if process has been served upon the agent of a party and he has failed to carry home knowledge to his principal that such notice has been served upon him, that the defendant should come in and file his affidavit denying that he had any notice of such service and asserting further under oath that he has a defense to the whole or a part of the cause of action. It is eminently proper that he should be entitled to have the judgment opened and be let in to a trial, so that he may make use of his legal defense. I think it would be unjust to the principal to permit the judgment to go against him merely by the default of the agent to give him notice, when he himself held in his hands a defense to the whole or any part of the cause of action in the case.

Now, sir, it is not to be presumed that defendants will make an affidavit of this kind unless it is true that they had no knowledge of the action; and it is not to be presumed that they will come in and make an affidavit declaring that they have a just and legal defense to the action as they believe, unless these things are true in fact; and if they are true, it would be unjust to shut the door and to bar the party from making use of this defense to the cause of action.

All of us who know anything about this mode of serving process know that sometimes injustice is done. I recall to mind a case that came within my own practice a few years ago. Under our law you may make service of process upon the director of a railroad company, and in the case to which I refer it was a foreign railroad company that had control of a part of a road in our State. I happened to be looking over the affidavits filed with the judgment and found an affidavit filed claiming from the railroad company several hundred dollars. Service had been made upon a director. He had failed to communicate it to the president or treasurer of the company, and I myself had to hire a man and send him out to another State in order to get a party there to file a counter-affidavit. Thus it will be seen that these judgments may frequently go unjustly. In that case judgment would have gone in forty-eight hours against the party were it not that having done some business for the party I sent a special agent to summon him there to make the necessary affidavit in order that the railroad company might not be mulcted in this judgment. We all know, who have any practice at all, that this mode of serving process is liable to various objections, and unjust judgments are sometimes obtained by it because of the negligence of the agent in communicating to his principal the service that has been made. I think therefore the amendment which I have offered is eminently proper and ought to be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer another amendment. It will be observed that under this section if process is served only six hours before the return day, then judgment may go. It may be utterly impossible for the agent to communicate with his principal. I therefore move, after the word "process" in line 12 to insert "at least twenty days before the return day of such process;" so that the agent may have time to communicate with his principal.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does not my friend know that that is the law now? This does not change the time of service at all; it only changes the person on whom service is to be made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What is there in this bill that requires the service of process at all under it?

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend must be aware that the general law regulating the time of serving process applies to every suit. This bill does not change it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the eleventh section by inserting at the end of line 18 the words "or to any action for libel or slander;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to any suit on a cause of action accruing before July 1, 1874, or to any action for libel or slander.

The matter is quite fresh in my mind of attempts made in this District to bring parties from a distance to answer charges of this kind. Washington City is the great center of newspaper correspondence. Under the language which is used by those who have framed this section, the correspondents of newspapers would come within the description of the law, and the result would be that to the courts of the District of Columbia would be confided the jurisdiction of all cases for alleged libel and the damages claimed thereunder. I should not be willing, with my present information and experience on that subject, to see that done. The cases of contract, the cases of tort for personal injury may be reasonable enough, although in those cases I have already stated my objection to this extension of the law of constructive service of process; but in this other class of cases less reason applies for seeking trial at a distance from the residence of the party chargeable than in any other case of which I have thought, and none of the objections which have been urged to limiting this service of process upon agents would apply to the service of process upon the class of agents to whom I have referred.

If the object of the bill be a general one, to procure an easy service of process constructively upon agents for all matters of contract or all matters of tort to the person, it will be secured after the adoption of this amendment as well as before. But I, for one, shall not knowingly vote to bring that class of cases, the class of cases to which I have referred, within the jurisdiction of the courts of the District of Columbia, and therefore I hope the amendment will be adopted; and on it I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not believe there is a country on the face of this globe in which substituted service in an action for slander or libel is permitted, and of all countries perhaps this is the one in which it ought to be the least thought of. Take a great journal in one of the large cities. It has agents perhaps in a dozen other cities. The idea that any person, supposing himself to have been injured by any publication in that paper, can roam over the United States and select his own forum wherever that journal may have an agent, seems to me to be without any good sound reason to support it, to say nothing about what it would make of the District of Columbia. Take the case of a journal that has agents in almost every great city, as some of them have; under this bill, wholly independent of any action of the agent himself, jurisdiction over that newspaper publisher or magazine publisher or book publisher might be obtained wherever an agent could be found, thus giving to the paintiff the right to select his own forum, instead of doing what in almost every other case a party is required to do, bring his action where the defendant can be served with process. I do not think, as I said before, that in any country on this globe substituted service, for this is practically though not technically substituted service, is permitted in actions for defamation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it is with great diffidence that I differ in opinion from the Committee on the Judiciary who has had this matter under consideration; but at the same time, in a matter of this kind, I feel it to be my duty to be governed by my own convictions as to what is proper and right rather than upon the opinions of others, however much I may esteem those opinions and those who entertain them.

Sir, I conceive this to be the most alarming legislation that I have known since I have been a member of this body. What is this bill? It is simply this: that any person having a claim, real or fictitious, may sue a person living in another State or Territory and recover judgment against him simply by making service upon his agent anywhere in the United States. It is not necessary that that agent should reside where service is made on him.

Mr. CARPENTER. My friend is entirely mistaken; we have not done any such absurd thing as that.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I call the attention of the Senate to the language of this section:

Against any corporation or other person residing in the United States and doing business in the State, Territory, or District where said suit is brought, and having in said State, Territory, or District where said suit is brought an agent or agents in respect of the matter out of which the case arises.

Mr. CARPENTER. Having an agent in the State where the suit is brought, not anywhere in the United States.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Let me suppose a case. It is well known that mercantile houses at this time largely sell goods through traveling agents, or drummers, as they are called, who take orders and by whom sales are effected. That class of agents being authorized to sell goods by their principals, service may be made upon them in any case growing out of the sale of goods. An action may be brought in the State of Wisconsin against a merchant of Boston, and service made upon an agent who happens to be in that State because he is there. He is there doing business, and his principal has him there in that State doing business in respect to the sale of goods. If this claim is brought upon a matter growing out of a sale of goods by that house, (and we all know the character of many of these traveling agents,) this bill does not provide that the suit when entered shall be continued and actual notice given to the principal, but service upon an agent of that kind is to be taken in court just as though it were service on the principal. Judgment may be recovered against that principal, without his having any knowledge whatever, for a million dollars, and that judgment is good, and there is no provision in this bill by which there can be any review or any questions heard again upon that suit.

I say, Mr. President, this is alarming legislation. It is legislation for which I for one cannot vote, however well recommended it may be by the committee whence it comes; for I can see that there will be occasions and opportunities for great frauds upon men who do business in distant States and Territories. There will be opportunity for their betrayal and their ruin by men who are acting as their agents, and who have not received from them the degree of confidence which this bill supposes them to have. I hope that the Senate will not at this session and upon such slight consideration pass a bill which seems to me to involve such consequences as these.

Furthermore, a Senator has just proposed to amend this bill by adding a provision in respect to libel and slander. Suppose that that amendment does not prevail, what will the result be? A newspaper editor in New Hampshire may be sued in Alabama if he has an agent there getting subscriptions. Suits may be brought here in this District before juries of this District against newspapers all over the United States. What shall we expect from the press under such circumstances, and what will be said about such legislation as that?

Mr. President, although it seems to me that there might possibly be some good flowing out of this legislation in some few cases, yet the evils which will inevitably grow out of it outweigh all the benefits which it can give rise to. These are my opinions. The Senate can take them for what they are worth. They are sufficient for me to act upon; and upon them I shall give my vote.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in regard to slander and libel.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware by striking it out altogether and inserting in line 12, after the word "process," the words "and delivering a copy thereof to the principal of such agent anywhere in the United States;" so as to read:

That service may be made by delivering to such agent, or to either of such agents where there is more than one, a copy of such process and delivering a copy thereof to the principal of such agent anywhere in the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. That is not in order just now.

Mr. BAYARD. That is not an amendment to my amendment. My amendment is to insert words at the end of the section.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well; this can be moved afterward. I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be voted down, and then I will offer this which meets all the objections suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, West, Windom, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Jones, Logan, Oglesby, Stevenson, Tipton, and Washburn—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not think there is the slightest necessity for it, but to meet the fear which the Senator from New Hampshire has expressed and make this bill satisfactory to him, I move to amend in the twelfth line of section 11, by inserting after the word "process" the words "and delivering a copy thereof to the principal of such agent anywhere in the United States;" so that the section will read:

That service may be made by delivery to such agent, or to either of such agents, where there is more than one, a copy of such process, and delivering a copy thereof to the principal of such agent anywhere in the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will readily see that unless provision is made also for the delivery of the copy to the principal in time——

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator will see if he will look at it that this is a part of the service. No suit can proceed until service is made, and this amendment will make it a part of the service to serve a copy on the principal as well as the agent.

Mr. BAYARD. And the return will have to disclose both facts?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. Does that require personal delivery?

Mr. CARPENTER. "Delivering to him" means delivering personal, of course.

Mr. BAYARD. There is such a thing as a service and such a thing as personal service. We are having a good deal of service in the present bill never known in the law before.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is none but personal service except as provided for by law.

Mr. BAYARD. But the Senator is providing for a service that is not personal. This section would have no effect without that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Where does the Senator want the words to come in? I have no objection to inserting "and delivering of a copy thereof personally to the principal." Will that suit?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. How does it appear to the court that such delivery was made?

Mr. CARPENTER. This act is not designed to embody all the law that applies to process and practice in the Federal courts. What the law now provides for the return of service will remain provided for, and we simply here declare what service shall be, to wit, the delivery of a copy to the agent in the jurisdiction and the delivery of a copy to the principal personally anywhere in the United States. That is the service.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask how is that to be made to appear to the court? There is no provision in the law, as the Senator very well knows, regulating the service of process such as this here provided for.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is regulated by the general law applicable to all cases.

Mr. MERRIMON. What general law? It ought to appear by affidavit of the party surely to the court before the court should proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to suggest to my friend from Wisconsin that in trying to adapt the bill to the notions of those who are against it in any form, he has to come to a point where he runs a risk. When you say that service may be made by delivering a copy to a man or leaving the same at his usual place of residence with any person of suitable age, being come to years of discretion, you have provided a case where the service need not be personal; but when you say that service must be by delivering a copy thereof to the man or to the corporation, that means personal service in every sense indicated by the Senator from Delaware. But when in a section like this you adopt, as the Senator from Wisconsin proposes, words saying "delivered personally to the principal or such agent," and come to the case of a corporation, I am not prepared to say precisely where that would leave it. It is a little difficult to deliver to a corporation personally a copy of a paper; and if the Senator from Wisconsin who seems now to be consulting the tastes in composition of various members of the Senate thinks that he ought to do anything the effect of which I humbly conceive must be to obscure the present meaning, I venture to suggest to him that the word "actual" would be a safer word than "personal," when you consider that artificial as well as natural persons are parties concerned. I should hardly know how to hand a paper personally to the New York Central and Hudson River Railway Company. I should know how to deliver it to that corporation, and I should know how to deliver it actually; but when it came to be delivered to them personally I might have some doubt what that meant.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am satisfied that the suggestion of the Senator from New York is entirely sound, and I therefore modify my amendment thus: strike out the word "personal," and after the word "and" insert "actual;" so as to read:

Delivery to such agent, or to either of such agents where there is more than one, a copy of such process, and actual delivery of a copy thereof to the principal of such agent anywhere in the United States.

Mr. STOCKTON. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin admits the principle that has been contended for, and that is that service on an agent in the District of Columbia, for example, is not a legal or proper or just service for this purpose. After the objection being made, he modifies his amendment so that there shall be actual service on the principal. The remark of the Senator from North Carolina was very pertinent: how does that appear to the court? You have a right in court to object to the service. You are not bound to appear if the service has not been in accordance with the statute, and therefore the court must have jurisdiction to decide that point. This bill, as now amended by the Senator from Wisconsin, will extend the jurisdiction of all the courts of the United States all over the United States, so that the jurisdiction of a little court in the District of Columbia where judges are appointed by the President will extend all over the United States from Maine to New Orleans; and the question of the Senator from North Carolina was very pertinent and unanswerable: how is it to appear to the court? How is it to appear to the court that service made in New Orleans upon the principal there, the owner perhaps of the New Orleans Picayune, has been properly made in accordance with the requirements of law, whether it was actual or not, and who authorized the officer to serve the process there? Do you mean to give such power and such jurisdiction to all those petty courts? I trow not. I do not think the Judiciary Committee so intended; and when the Senator from Wisconsin comes to meet the fair objection that the service of process upon an agent is not sufficient when the principal may be found in all his property and personally affected by suits, he admits that the principal ought to have notice. It should also be known to the court that he has had actual service. I say when he admits that he admits that he is obliged to have this process served outside of the jurisdiction of these courts. I think this bill has not been perfected. I think that the committee themselves, in the course of the few words which have passed on the subject here, have admitted that it has not been wisely considered. I think when the Senator from Wisconsin has altered his bill in reference to so important a particular, involving so important a principle in the history of our judiciary and making such radical changes, and has admitted right in the face of the Senate that he was willing to alter it in important particulars, it would be much more wise for the committee to reconsider the bill before pushing it to a vote in the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I am rather inclined to submit gracefully to the Senator from New Jersey. The committee has worked upon this bill about three weeks, more or less, at every session. I have found what a difficult task it was to satisfy seven minds. I have drawn the bill myself from end to end three times, all excepting the last section which repeals other acts and which remains the same. Now, after having got it so that every member of the committee was satisfied with it except that one member dissented from one section, I bring the bill into the Senate, and for the purpose of satisfying what seems to me an utterly and unfounded fear on the part of my friend from New Hampshire, but wishing to satisfy everybody if I could with the bill, it certainly not affecting the principle or substantial usefulness of it, I yielded that, as I deemed, unnecessary amendment. The Senator from New Jersey jumps upon me and says I have conceded by yielding to that suggestion that this bill has not been properly considered in the committee. Mr. President, I did not think it was necessary to make that amendment. I have no objection to it; it does not hurt the substance of the bill, and I was willing to make it, but I certainly protest that because I did yield to that suggestion it is not to be presumed that the committee have not considered the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer this amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was certainly in the second degree. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will be read for information to see whether the Senator from Wisconsin will accept it; but it is not in order to offer it now.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is:

Which service shall be made to appear to the court by the affidavit of the person so making the same.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have no objection to that. The fact cannot appear in any other way.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to it either except that it introduces disorder and insecurity into the legislative jurisprudence of the United States. Now, the laws provide how proof of service shall be made, and those laws are the product of years of experience. Here comes a Senator now and proposes to substitute an ex parte affidavit for an official return and the various other modes of verifying service which the law provides.

Mr. MERRIMON. It so happens that I know a little about the laws of the United States, though it is very little; and I know that the law makes no provision in the world for ascertaining service in this way, and I ask any member of the Judiciary Committee to point out any statute of the United States which provides for making such service as this appear to the court.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what the Senator means? When a statute requires that proof of service of mesne process shall be made in certain ways, and an act afterward provides an additional mode of making the service, does the Senator mean to tell us that the requirements as to proof of service do not apply just as much to the last statute as they do to the first?

Mr. MERRIMON. I answer the Senator by adverting to the law in reference to returns of process. One method of making return is personal service by the marshal, and the marshal certifies that fact to the court; and that is evidence that there was process. Another method is by leaving a copy of the process at the dwelling-house of the party on whom process is served, and the marshal certifies that he left such duplicate or copy at his last place of abode. Those are the only two ways in which service of process is made known to the courts of the United States.

Mr. CARPENTER. Allow me to interrupt my friend. I will accept his amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well; then I will stop.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin accepts the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. I should like to offer an amendment to section 11. In line 5, after the word "brought," I move to insert—

And when any party to such suit shall be a resident within the jurisdiction of the court.

That is in the district where the action is brought.

Mr. CARPENTER. That would strike down the whole philosophy of the bill.

Mr. HAGER. O, no.

Mr. CONKLING. You can make service now when you catch the party in the State.

Mr. HAGER. I will explain—as the bill now reads a plaintiff may bring an action in the United States circuit or district court in a State where neither he nor any party to the suit resides. For instance, two parties residing in New York have a business transaction; one has an agent in San Francisco, a commission merchant to sell his merchandise, or anything else; the other institutes suit in California and serves process on an agent or consignee there, where none of the parties or witnesses reside. This may be extended to all kinds of agents—for banks, insurance companies, &c. In this respect this bill is not right. A plaintiff may select his tribunal where he resides or where a defendant resides. To this there is no objection. So you might say a defendant ought to be at some convenient place where with his witnesses he can be heard.

By State laws provisions are made for the transfer of cases from one court to another for the convenience of parties. A plaintiff for the purpose of persecuting a defendant leaves New York City, where all the witnesses are, the plaintiff's and the defendant's, and without any excuse whatever he goes to California or elsewhere where he can find an agent, and institutes his suit where none of the parties reside. I would ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether that would be right? But if the plaintiff selects a tribunal where he resides—he being within the jurisdiction of the court—there is some reason in that, because if he has a cause of action it may be that the convenience of his own witnesses requires that it should be tried there. If he selects a tribunal where the defendant resides within its jurisdiction, there may be good reason for that. But to select a tribunal where neither the plaintiff nor defendant nor any party to the suit resides may work a great hardship and even injustice in many cases, and I see no cause for the rule; but it seems to be both prudent and sensible that the defendant or some party to the suit should be within the jurisdiction of the tribunal selected. This will have a tendency to localize actions and to compel the trial where some of the parties are within reach of their witnesses; otherwise courts may be used as engines of oppression to deny instead of administering justice. There is safety, therefore, in selecting a court, be it circuit or district, within whose jurisdiction some of the parties belong.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator's argument is against the Constitution of the United States just as much as it is against this bill. If the Constitution of the United States is an instrument to secure and guarantee oppression, this bill follows it right up, just exactly in the same language, to the same effect, and does nothing more.

Mr. HAGER. I should like to have the Senator explain.

Mr. CARPENTER. The explanation is simply that the Constitution gives the Federal Government judicial power over all controversies between citizens of different States.

Mr. HAGER. What then?

Mr. CARPENTER. Every motion to change the venue that can be made by the existing law can be made under this law. This does not affect that at all.

Mr. HAGER. But the Senator perhaps did not understand the point I made. I intend by the amendment I offer to limit the institution of actions to a tribunal where some of the parties reside, subject to the same change of venue. I do not know anything in the Constitution of the United States in conflict with such an amendment.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does the Senator know anything in the Constitution of the United States which requires that a suit shall be brought in a State where one of the parties resides?

Mr. HAGER. No; and nothing to the contrary. But I see a great hardship in compelling a party to go to a distant State without reason.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is a hardship imposed by the Constitution. We are not answerable for it.

Mr. HAGER. The Constitution has nothing to do with it. The judiciary act may have something to do with it, but not the Constitution. The point I made was that the plaintiff and defendant, residing both in the city of New York, where all the witnesses are, the plaintiff for the purpose of persecuting a man, may go to California and institute a suit there under this law, when there is no reason for it in the world and no advantage or convenience to either party.

Mr. CARPENTER. Can he not do that now?

Mr. HAGER. No.

Mr. CARPENTER. He has to sue him in a State court perhaps. Take the very case the Senator puts. Suppose two men from New York or Pennsylvania have got to litigation and the Pennsylvanian wants to sue the New Yorker. He hears that he is going to California. Now he says "I will follow him to California and sue him over there." He follows him to California, and he sues him in a State court, as he may do. The other man can immediately change the suit into the Federal court, just as this bill authorizes the original suit to be brought in the Federal court, and then both parties are being tried in a court which is their own court, a court of the Union of which they are citizens. In the other case one man compels another to be tried in a foreign jurisdiction without any right to bring his case to the Supreme Court at Washington. That is a hardship which certainly is not in the Constitution of the United States and which this bill creates.

Mr. HAGER. I am aware of the fact that a party may commence a suit where he finds the defendant, and if a man is a sojourner temporarily in California, being a resident of Pennsylvania, if he is served there it is a casualty. True, it may occur. But this law proposes to make what is now a casualty a matter of right for a party to commence an action anywhere, whether he finds the defendant there or not. It is sufficient if he finds some person acting as his agent for any purpose, and who may know nothing about the merits of the cause of action, and may have no information or authority to make a defense. He may not even be bound to inform the party in interest. The amendment should be adopted.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, there is another objection to this bill which I did not allude to particularly when I was up before, which I desire to state now. This bill applies to the District of Columbia. To my mind that is very objectionable. Suppose a law similar to this had been in force when Mr. Tweed held carnival in New York City, so that Mr. Tweed could sue any newspaper in the United States whose agents he could find in New York City, and bring the suit for trial before his tools upon the juries of the city of New York, what newspaper would have dared to criticise when its editor might be tried for libel before a jury selected perhaps by himself? That applies to the District of Columbia in this respect. We all know how the citizens of the District of Columbia are influenced by the party which holds control of the General Government. To a great extent they are the recipients of the bounty of the General Government and live upon it. Suppose, Mr. President, that another party comes into power, how shall the press of the United States, which may wish to criticise the acts of that party, dare to do it when its editors are to be tried before juries selected here in this District where the General Government is all-potential and all-powerful.

Mr. President, this strikes at public liberty itself. Suppose that an act similar to this had been on the statute-books of the United States in the dark days of slavery prior to 1860, could not the General Government at that time have crushed out all unfriendly criticism on the part of those journals which condemned its proceedings in relation to slavery? What chance would a journalist living in New Hampshire, or in Massachusetts, or in New York have had in 1860 tried before a jury of the District of Columbia for a libel upon some person connected with the Government of the United States? None whatever. And that will always be so. The newspapers must necessarily to a great extent have agents here in this District, so that they may find and communicate news to their readers, and when they do so you bring them within the power of the General Government, so that they will not dare to utter any unfriendly criticism against that Government. I am opposed to it for that reason and because in my view this act and the principle upon which it stands in that respect strike a blow at the freedom of the press, because it compels the conductor of a press in Boston, or New York, or anywhere in the United States, to come here to the District of Columbia and have his trial for a libel upon the officers of the General Government for criticism upon their doings before a jury which must necessarily be largely and almost inevitably influenced by that Government itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in section 11, line 5, after the word "brought," to insert "when any party to such suit shall be a resident within the jurisdiction of such court."

Mr. HAGER. That means either the plaintiff or the defendant. Some one party shall reside within the District.

Mr. STOCKTON. If I understand this matter it seems to me, referring to the conversation which took place between the Senator from California and the Senator from Wisconsin, that this bill is really so far from being in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, opposed to its spirit. I should like to ask whether that clause which guarantees to us the right of trial by jury means a jury in New Orleans to try a man for an offense committed in Maine?

Mr. CARPENTER. This bill does not touch offenses at all.

Mr. STOCKTON. Whether it touches offenses or not does not alter the principle, because actions of libel may be as serious in reference to their effect on the person as well as property as any criminal case. It is true, as the Senator says, that the bill does not affect criminal causes technically, yet I say that every citizen of this country is entitled by the common law of England—and the common law of England is adopted in this country—not only to the right of trial by jury, but to trial by a jury of the vicinage; and it never has been held otherwise.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend tell me where that was ever held once since the morning stars sang together that a transitory action must be tried in the vicinage?

Mr. STOCKTON. I will tell the Senator before I get through if he will have the patience to listen to me. Actions were divided into local and transitory. A local action must be tried in the place where it occurred. A transitory action must be tried where the plaintiff lives, where the defendant lives, or where the cause of action arose if it was a tort. If it was a criminal offense, the act must be laid to have been done within the body of a county where the offense was to be tried and so proved, and the defendant was entitled to trial by a jury of the vicinage, and on the same principle and in the same line when a man was tried in a civil action it must be where the defendant was caught or where he himself resided or where he could serve process, and that law is founded on the principle that the jury were to be his peers and his neighbors to try his case.

A justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial body in this country, cannot hear a case out of his own circuit; and it has been doubted and gravely argued in the court that a judge of the Supreme Court sitting in Washington during the session of the Supreme Court cannot hear an application for an junction and bring the parties and witnesses from a southern district to Washington to listen to even a preliminary application, so careful has the law been in practice by all its rules and by the statutes of the United States made to regulate practice in accordanc with the common law of the land and the rules which govern the jurisdiction of the courts. While strictly the Senator from Wisconsin had a perfect right to find fault with my statement that a man was not always entitled to a jury of the vicinage in civil cases, yet in principle my assertion was true; and the very fact that rules are made for changing the venue, the very fact that liberty is given in transitory actions, but that that liberty is bound down by just such rules as the Senator from California desires to apply to this bill, is an argument in favor of the amendment of the Senator from California rather than against it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, the law now is that you can sue a man wherever you can find him in any civil action. This bill does not change that law at all.

Mr. HAGER. Neither does the amendment that I have moved.

Mr. CARPENTER. Your amendment does change it. You cannot sue him where you find him——

Mr. HAGER. Certainly you can.

Mr. CARPENTER. You cannot, if one or the other does not happen to live there. That is the amendment.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CARPENTER. I decline to be interrupted, because I know what I am stating. I am stating a proposition of my own and not the Senator's, and I know I am stating it correctly. What I mean is that any citizen of this District can follow me to France and sue me there on a civil contract. He can follow me to England, Ireland, or Scotland, and sue me there on a civil contract. My neighbor in Illinois may follow me to California and sue me on a civil contract in a State court, neither of us residing there. He may do the same in any State or in any nation where he finds me. This bill does precisely the same thing with regard to the Federal courts. There is no danger to be apprehended from men journeying away from their homes to catch each other to be sued.

Mr. STOCKTON. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. In all the cases he puts the party is found within the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. CARPENTER. He must be under this bill either by himself or by an authorized agent in respect to the very thing out of which the cause of action arises; and that is a limitation of the jurisdiction.

Mr. STOCKTON. But when the Senator suggested that process should be served out of the jurisdiction, and gave way and himself offered that amendment, he then conceded that it was not proper simply to serve process on the agent without requiring service on the principal.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not concede anything of the kind.

Mr. STOCKTON. The service of process on the principal outside of the jurisdiction was required by the amendment.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not admit anything of the kind; on the contrary, I said that I thought it was wholly unnecessary; that I offered it to soothe the fears of my friend from New Hampshire, and for no other purpose. There is not a single thing in this bill which gives any right which does not exist now, except that it provides for such litigation in Federal courts instead of in a State court; which instead of being a hardship is exactly the other way, because we all, no matter what State we live in, have a parcel of title and proprietorship in the Federal courts, while we have not in the courts of the State where we do not reside.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. By the law of 1789 is not the citizenship of parties litigant required to be in the district where the suit is brought?

Mr. CARPENTER. No; simply his residence. Under the present Constitution they mean the same thing. They did not then necessarily, but they do now.

Mr. BAYARD. The present law requires that one of the parties shall be resident in the district where the suit is brought. This present bill does not so provide.

Mr. CARPENTER. This present bill is intended to confer a jurisdiction just as it is conferred in the Constitution, without that limitation. When I speak of the law, however, I do not mean the Federal law, because the Senator could not have so understood me, but he understood me to say that I was speaking of the State courts of California, and I said that a gentleman from Illinois might follow me to California and sue me there in the State courts, and this bill gave the right to sue in the Federal courts and made no other change.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the question will come for the Senate to consider between the wisdom of the law of 1789——

Mr. CARPENTER. And the wisdom of the Constitution.

Mr. BAYARD. The wisdom of the law of 1789 and the wisdom of the Senator from Wisconsin who now proposes to amend it. That is the difference between the two. The law of 1789 requires one of the parties to be a resident in the district where the suit is brought, and the Senator from Wisconsin in his anxiety to increase the Federal jurisdiction proposes that neither of the parties may be a resident of the district but that they shall be citizens of the different States. That is all.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is all the Constitution requires.

Mr. BAYARD. The Constitution requires that; but I say the law of 1789 was built by wise men. It has been the law of this country until to-day. The action under it has been satisfactory by requiring one of the parties to be a resident of the district where the suit is brought. It was a wise restriction. It has been tested by the experience of time. And what cause is there for uprooting this and other venerable landmarks of the past? I do put the wisdom of the Senate of 1789 against the wisdom of the Senator of Wisconsin of to-day, and it is no disparagement to him to say that this law having stood the test of time should not be lightly changed.

You are now allowing a man to sue his defendant in a district where the defendant does not reside, and in a district where he himself does not reside. He follows him until he finds both of them in a strange country; and there, where neither is known, where less opportunity for a just trial exists than the law of 1789 required, the suit may be commenced and may be commenced in this excessively unreal, highly constructive method of summoning him not personally but by some man who is called his agent. Even the word "authorized" is not inserted before "agent." The agency is of the most shadowy character. He may be his agent by the merest conversation. He may be alleged to be his agent only, and then proved to be his agent perhaps by the man himself if the agent can prove his authority; and that is to deprive a man of his property to the extent of his entire fortune, or it may be of that which is more value to him in the shape of his character.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator from Delaware says that he puts the act of 1789 against the wisdom of the Senator from Wisconsin. Well, it is pretty hard on me to put the wisdom of a statute against mine; but I propose to state the issue a little differently. I put the wisdom of the Constitution of the United States against the wisdom of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Is the act of 1789 in contravention of the Constitution?

Mr. CARPENTER. I think it is substantially in contravention of the Constitution, and I will state why. The Constitution says that certain judicial powers shall be conferred upon the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States in an opinion delivered by Judge Story—I do not recollect now in what celebrated case it was, whether Cohens vs. Virginia or some of those famous cases—said that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to vest all the judicial power of the Union in some Federal court, and if they may withhold a part of it they may withhold all of it and defeat the Constitution by refusing or simply omitting to carry its provisions into execution.

The Constitution of the United States declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all controversies between citizens of different States. A controversy between the Senator and myself is a controversy between citizens of different States. If we both happen to meet in New York, it is a controversy between citizens of different States, and by the Constitution I may sue him in the Federal court in New York, because the controversy between us is between citizens of different States. The act of 1789 did not confer the whole power which the Constitution conferred; it did not do what the Supreme Court has said Congress ought to do; it did not perform what the Supreme Court has declared to be the duty of Congress. This bill does. This bill confers that right, and why have we done so? The act of 1789 was undoubtedly a wise act for that time; but the thirteen States which then constituted the Union have grown now to thirty-seven; our commerce that was streaming up and down the Atlantic coast crosses the continent; our people have become totally changed in their methods of doing business; we are a roving, traveling people; the New Yorker is as much at home in California as he used to be in Massachusetts; he does not feel farther away from his fireside when he sits down by the billows of the Pacific than he used to when he was at Cape Cod, and in fact he is not, because he can return as quickly. The whole circumstances of the people, the necessities of business, our situation, have totally and entirely changed.

As the law now stands—I speak of the law Federal and State—if there is a difficulty between the Senator from Delaware and myself, and we both meet in New York, he can sue me there in the State court. What does this bill do? It authorizes him to sue me there in the Federal court. Is that hardship? Is the Congress of the United States to say that the Federal courts in New York cannot be trusted as well as the State courts of New York? This bill gives precisely the power which the Constitution confers—nothing more, nothing less. The Senator from California proposes to limit the constitutional jurisdiction and restrict it because it was restricted in 1789. In that day to find a man two or three hundred miles or in two or three States away from his home and sue him was a hardship. It has ceased to be a hardship now, because we are nearly always away from home, we are roving and changing and traveling. The whole circumstances of the case are different, and the time has now arrived it seems to me when Congress ought to do what the Supreme Court said more than forty years ago it was its duty to do, vest the power which the Constitution confers in some court of original jurisdiction. Our circuit court is the only one of original jurisdiction in civil causes, and there it properly belongs. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from California will be rejected.

Mr. HAGER. I did not suppose that this amendment would meet with any serious opposition when I offered it. I did so with a view to improving the bill.

Now we are all aware that a plaintiff may follow the defendant and institute a suit in any court within the jurisdiction of which that defendant is found. If a person be casually found in California, (the plaintiff being in New York,) he is there personally to be served with process. There is no difficulty about that. If he goes to France, by comity perhaps the plaintiff might be authorized to bring his suit there, not by virtue of our laws, because they have no extraterritorial force, but by virtue of the local law there, whatever it may be. But that has nothing to do with the proposition here on this amendment.

As I understand the law now to be, a party must commence a suit against a defendant in a circuit or district court within the jurisdiction of which that defendant is found to be served with process. If a suit is brought against a ship, the libel must be in the district where the ship may be found at the time. This section proposes to change what has been heretofore a well-settled regulation of the law. The Constitution, as we all know, provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to certain enumerated cases, "to all cases affecting embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States," and so on. Now, suppose a suit be instituted that concerns an embassador or a consul. The embassador may be here, the consul may be in New York, but the suit is instituted in California if an agent acting for any purpose be found there. Those are the points I wish to call attention to. Suppose the consul resides in New York and the suit is brought in Texas where neither plaintiff nor defendant resides. Suppose the embassador resides here in the District, and the suit is instituted in California where neither plaintiff nor defendant resides, or suppose a suit is brought against the owners of a ship by suing an agent in New York when the ship and all concerned are in California or Liverpool with all the evidence and witnesses and where the parties may all reside.

If my proposition had been equivalent to the existing law, as I recollect it, that the suit must be brought where the defendants or some of them reside it might have been subject to some of the Senator's criticism; but that is not the case. The amendment I propose is that it shall be brought in a tribunal where some of the parties are within the jurisdiction of the court, be it either a plaintiff or a defendant to the action. I cannot, notwithstanding all that has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin, see any objection to the amendment I have proposed. There is certainly no reason why a party residing in New York should go to Texas or California to commence suit against a defendant residing in New York, unless he has some purpose other than justice to subserve. But under this bill a party may go into Texas or California or Oregon if an agent can be found there and institute legal proceedings to enforce rights and have a controversy determined before a tribunal within the jurisdiction of which none of the parties reside and where none of the witnesses are at hand. It is against a casualty a hardship of that kind that I propose this amendment. If I was governed by my own judgment alone I would say that the suit should be instituted in a tribunal where some of the defendants were within the jurisdiction of the court. This amendment does not go so far as that, but only to the extent that some party to the proceeding shall be within the jurisdiction of the court at the time the action is instituted.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a single question about an expression in the eleventh section. It provides that suit may be brought in any State or Territory in which the defendant is doing business "and in which he has an agent in respect of such matter."

Mr. CARPENTER. "Business or matter" it reads now.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose a citizen of Maryland is engaged in the manufacture of carriages. He buys materials in New York. He has an agent in the city of Indianapolis for the sale of his carriages. Can the New York merchant who sold him materials sue him in Indiana by serving process upon the agent who is there engaged in the sale of his carriages? He is an agent in respect of the general business in which the Maryland defendant is engaged.

Mr. CARPENTER. But the case would not arise out of his general business; it would not arise out of his buying material in New York. It would arise, for instance, out of his selling to you a wagon in Indianapolis and recommending it to be a sound wagon when it was not. That would be your cause of action and he would have there an agent in regard to the business and matter out of which your cause of action arose. Your cause of action would not arise out of the selling of material for manufacturing; it would arise in Indiana out of the sale of the wagon to you.

Mr. MORTON. But still, would not the agent in Indianapolis be an agent in respect of the general matter or business in which the defendant was employed and in regard to which the debt was contracted?

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not the way the section reads. He must be an agent of the principal in regard of the business or matter out of which the cause of action arose.

Mr. MORTON. If it would bear the other construction it would be entirely too broad.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no room for the other construction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that the eleventh section of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. That is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to strike out the section is not in order, that being a part of the amendment just made.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the reconsideration.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stockton, and Wadleigh—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Tipton, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Stewart, Thurman, and West—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. STOCKTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAGER. I merely want to say one word. This bill will necessarily break up all such things as doing business by agents, whether it be commission merchants or otherwise, whether a man is a foreigner or a citizen. No one can do his business through an agent in any way whatever without rendering himself liable to be prosecuted without his knowing anything about the suits pending, and being subjected to a judgment such as may be pronounced by a court in his absence without a hearing. It certainly is a very dangerous law when it comes to be enforced, and it will necessarily interfere with the business interests of the country to a very considerable extent. I have never had occasion to examine it before it came before the Senate this morning, but it appears to me it must have the effect to break up all business that has been done hitherto by the assistance of agents, whether it be manufacturing, mercantile, or otherwise. Necessarily that will be the effect if it becomes a constitutional law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say on this point that we considered this bill very carefully in committee. As I said a little while ago, this in substance has been the law of Vermont almost ever since I can remember; I think it is the law of Massachusetts and most of the New England States and most of the other States, and there never has been a single instance that ever I heard of in the little professional or other experience that I have had in this world in which any injustice or wrong has happened from the existence of such a statute, but quite the reverse. I do not want to take the time of the Senate in prolonging the debate upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stockton, and Wadleigh—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton,

Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Thurman, Tipton, and West—18.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the title of the bill be read. It may not be correct.

The CHIEF CLERK. "An act regulating the removal of causes from the State courts to the circuit courts of the United States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The title ought to be amended so as to read "An act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be so amended.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL of Pennsylvania, Mr. J. M. RUSK of Wisconsin, and Mr. ERASTUS WELLS of Missouri managers at the same on its part.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WEST, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of J. Madison Wells, praying to be allowed to present to the Court of Claims his claim for cotton, sugar, and molasses taken by the United States Army, and that the petitioner be allowed to withdraw his petition and papers.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3581) to protect persons of foreign birth against forcible constraint or involuntary servitude, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3181) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Thayer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask leave to make a report from a committee, upon which I desire action at once. I do not think it will take any time. It is a question of some importance, but I do not think it will give rise to any discussion. I am directed by the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2988) to provide for the appointment of a commission of engineers to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, to report it back and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it go over.

Mr. ALCORN. I will say to the honorable Senator that the bill only provides for a commission of engineers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I know; but that will have to be explained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine object.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; I object to its present consideration.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were by a resolution of January 9, 1874, instructed to inquire whether the ocean mail-steamships carrying the mails between the United States and China have been subjected to inspection and survey, &c., submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. On the 9th instant the bill (H. R. No. 2246) relating to circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The committee have reconsidered the bill and instruct me to report it back and to insist on the amendment that they offered before in the nature of a substitute, and recommend the passage of the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 940) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 941) to establish a post-route in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 942) to provide for the pre-payment of postage on printed matter, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 943) for the improvement of the Mississippi River; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 944) authorizing the delivery of certain bronze ordnance; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

PRINTING OF REPORT OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The meteorological observations which have been carried on by the Smithsonian Institution have been transferred to the Signal Office, and the signal officers have numerous correspondents throughout the country who are voluntary correspondents and receive no compensation; and it is desirable and perhaps necessary to the continuance of their services that the report of the Signal Officer should be sent to them. For this purpose the Chief Signal Officer has requested that he may have two thousand copies of an abridgment of his report, which will cost sixty cents each, to be printed for his use to be distributed to his correspondents. I offer a resolution to that effect:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That two thousand copies of the Report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1873 be printed and bound for the use of the Secretary of War.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXPENSES OF PRINTING INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation ordered by the Senate into certain charges against the Congressional Printer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move that the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3539) to admit free of duty merchandise sunk for two years and afterward recovered was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PROMOTIONS IN STAFF DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to withdraw the motion I entered on Saturday to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 321, authorizing appointments and promotions in the Medical and Ordance Departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote on the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of Bigler, Young & Co.;

A bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike;

A bill (H. R. No. 311) for the relief of William J. McIntyre;

A bill (H. R. No. 491) for the relief of Kerry Sullivan, of Company G, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan;

A bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 958) for the relief of Robert Sutherland;

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the honorable discharge from their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (heavy,) and directing their honorable muster out of the service of the United States as of the date of their dismissal;

A bill (H. R. No. 1108) for the relief of Alfred Fry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1219) for the relief of Charles W. Berry, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1313) for the relief of Alexander Burtch;

A bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Fifth Regiment Indiana Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter;

A bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin;

A bill (H. R. No. 1828) to further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1931) to authorize the sale of the military reservation of Fort Reynolds, in Colorado Territory, and the Government bildings thereon;

A bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas;

A bill (H. R. No. 2091) for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2207) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2211) for the relief of Beck & Wirth;

A bill (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Robert F. Winslow;

A bill (H. R. No. 2412) for the relief of Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2416) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expenses incurred by the States of Oregon and California in the suppression of Indian hostilities in the years 1872 and 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 2697) to create an additional major of artillery, and to promote Captain James M. Robertson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2698) for the relief of Joseph C. Breckinridge, for services in the Army of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 2699) for the relief of Robert Tillson & Co., of Quincy, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 2704) for the relief of Selden Connor;

A bill (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of Henry P. Ingram and John K. Askins;

A bill (H. R. No. 2039) to compensate D. R. Haggard for six months' service as colonel of the Fifth Kentucky United States Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2892) for the relief of Thomas Simms, late a lieutenant in the Seventy-fourth Regiment of New York Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3001) for the relief of Peter J. Knapp;

A bill (H. R. No. 3002) for the relief of Isaac Riseden, late a first lieutenant of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 3003) for the relief of George A. Bacon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3183) for the relief of Jonathan D. Hale;

A bill (H. R. No. 3303) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866;

A bill (H. R. No. 3335) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the city railroad company, Port Huron, Michigan; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CHANDLER. On Friday last I gave notice that on Monday at one o'clock I would ask the Senate to take up the river and harbor bill, being House bill No. 3168; and I now move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill for consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to give notice that after the post-office appropriation bill, which I understand is to succeed the present matter before the Senate, is disposed of, I shall call up the bill for the enforcement of law in Utah, which the Committee on the Judiciary instructed me to report to the Senate.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to give notice to the Senate that to-morrow I shall ask their attention to bills emanating from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SCOTT. I gave notice when I reported last week the bill making appropriations for the payment of claims allowed by the commissioners of claims that I would move to take it up to-day after the expiration of the morning hour. I presume the regular order which the Senator from Minnesota calls up will not occupy very long.

Mr. WINDOM. I think not, if we can ever reach it.

Mr. SCOTT. And I therefore desire to say that as soon as that is disposed of I shall move to take up this bill, and should I be disappointed in that not being reached to-day, I give notice that I shall continue to call for the consideration of this bill. It involves——

Mr. CONKLING. What bill does the Senator threaten us with?

Mr. SCOTT. I refer to the bill making appropriation for the awards made by the commissioners of claims. There are about one thousand claimants in that bill, all of whom I have no doubt are very desirous of receiving their money, and there are many Senators more interested in this bill than I am; but being charged with it, I shall seek to get it up at the earliest oportunity.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make a single observation for the edification of my friend from Pennsylvania as well as my friend from Michigan. We have arrived at a period of the session when we cannot afford to spend much time on the order of business. By general understanding, I think, the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the appropriation bills are to have the right of way, so to speak, when they are ready; and I think I can satisfy Senators in a moment that that is the only economy you can make of the time that is left us. Now, after the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota passes away from the Senate, as I trust it will in a few moments, we are ready to go on with the post-office appropriation bill. It is very important to the committee that we should have an opportunity to dispose of that bill at once, because to-morrow probably we shall have the sundry civil bill, which involves a good deal of consideration by the committee, and we cannot with propriety carry on two things at once; we cannot be here examining bills and attending to the consideration of that bill in committee at the same time. Therefore, I submit that according to the general understanding, when the pending order is disposed of, the appropriation bill should come up without any loss of time as to the order of business. Then my honorable friend from Pennsylvania will have an opportunity undoubtedly between this and the reporting of the other bill to dispose of his, as well as the Senator from Michigan. I agree entirely that those two bills should have the precedence next, as it seems to me, in the order of important business. I hope therefore my friend will see that without any disposition to oppose his wishes, it becomes absolutely necessary that the general order should be observed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order, being the resolution reported by the Select Committee on Transportation, is before the Senate.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. WINDOM from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, instructing the Committee on Appropriations to report amendments to the river and harbor bill making appropriations for completing the surveys and estimates for each of the improvements recommended by the select committee upon the four routes indicated in their report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. MERRIMON. When this question was under consideration before, I was about proceeding to address the Senate on the subject, when it adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair remembers now that the Senator was entitled to the floor. He had forgotten it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe, sir, as the session is now running so rapidly to a close and there is so much to do before we adjourn, I shall content myself by simply saying that I protest against this resolution and shall vote against it, and will take another opportunity to express what I wish to say about it. I reckon everybody has made up his mind about the resolution anyhow, and there will come a time when further appropriations are asked for when it will be appropriate and opportune to discuss the subject more at large.

Mr. PRATT. Before the vote is taken on this resolution I wish to submit my views very briefly to the Senate, not so much upon the general merits of the report of the committee as upon the plan which they submit. The resolution in its preamble recites that—

> After a most careful consideration of the merits of various proposed improvements, taking into account the cost, practicability, and probable advantages of each, the committee have come to the unanimous conclusion that the following are the most feasible and advantageous channels of commerce to be created or improved by the national Government, in case Congress shall act upon this subject, namely:
> First, the Mississippi River.
> Second, a continuous water line of adequate capacity from the Mississippi River to the city of New York, via the northern lakes.
> Third, a route adequate to the wants of commerce through the central tier of States from the Mississippi River, via the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers, to a point in West Virginia, and thence by canal and slack water, or by a freight railway, to tide-water.
> Fourth, a route from the Mississippi River, via the Ohio and Tennessee Rivers, to a point in Alabama or Tennessee, and thence by canal and slack-water, or by a freight railway, to the ocean.

Mr. President, if I supposed that in voting for this resolution which instructs the Committee on Appropriations to provide in the river and harbor bill an appropriation adequate for completing the surveys and estimates for making all these improvements, Congress was committed to constructing all of them now or hereafter, I should hesitate in giving it my support. In answer to questions propounded by me to the chairman of the transportation committee when this subject was last up, he informed the Senate that the plan of the committee was that work should be commenced and progress upon these four routes simultaneously; and further, that from the best information he could obtain, these four works of internal improvement would cost the country $155,000,000, or twenty-five millions annually, estimating their completion in six years. When questioned how so much money was to be raised, his ready solution was that the tax on tea and coffee could be reimposed.

Mr. President, I believe it one of the noblest and wisest employments of Government in time of peace to promote the welfare of the people, in wisely aiding in the construction of works of internal improvement which have for their object cheap transportation and cheap travel. The rapid and cheap interchange of the productions of different regions of our common country has grown to be the principal topic of the day. This commerce is estimated to be five times as great as our foreign commerce, which, as we know, was last year $1,200,000,000 in value. Whatever surplus we have, not needed for home consumption, of course seeks, and will continue to seek, a foreign market, and the price realized to the producer will depend largely upon the freight charges he pays to reach the sea-board.

Both for our internal and foreign commerce we want cheap means and methods of inland transportation. Agriculture must ever continue to be the leading industry in this country, and our surplus cotton, corn, wheat, beef, pork, cheese, &c., must be shipped to other countries to furnish us the means of supplying what we do not produce ourselves.

I do not know of any better use to which we can apply the public money, raised by taxation, than in benefiting the two great classes into which tax-payers are divided, having reference to the food question, the producing and the consuming classes; the one in giving them better prices for their crops, the other in giving them cheaper food. When the Iowa farmer can obtain for a bushel of corn only one-third of what the New Jersey farmer gets, it is a very evident thing that two-thirds of the price finally realized go into the pocket of the public carrier, and only one-third goes into the pocket of the farmer; and next, that the consumer who lives on the sea-board gets no benefit of the low price of food in the West. If instead of costing fifty cents to get a bushel of corn to market it costs but twenty-five, then both parties, the producer and consumer, are benefited and in equal degree, and no one loses but the railroad or transportation company, which has heretofore pocketed two-thirds of the price paid for the article when landed in New York for carrying it there from Iowa.

This is the grievance, sir, which both regions, the East and the West, are protesting against at this time—the two classes I have named. They are not silly enough to repine at what is inevitable; that one portion of our countrymen live hard by the gateways of foreign commerce, while other portions live five hundred, one thousand, or fifteen hundred miles inland; but what they do complain of, and in my judgment with justice, is that it costs too much under existing arrangements for the exchange of the products and commodities of the two regions.

Now, of course every one sees, except the railroad companies, the justice and propriety of such legislation as shall benefit these two classes, and we can only differ as to the means. I think the people would be content with the existing facilities, provided Congress would interfere and provide a method for regulating the fares and freights over the great trunk lines which cross the States, so that the charges should not be unreasonable, having reference to the cost of the roads and the expense of operating them. The people are not hostile to railroads, but to their combinations and their discriminating and exorbitant rates. They do not object that they should make for their shareholders as much as these shareholders could make with their money in other forms of business investments. But they do object to enormous profits upon the actual capital invested to their own impoverishment.

As to the natural highways of the country—our rivers, lakes, and the sea, of course everybody sees the propriety of their improvement, and the Government has pursued the policy with some interruptions from the beginning of removing obstructions and furnishing additional facilities. But the committee propose to go a good deal further than we have gone hitherto. The United States have never built a canal heretofore. They have constructed military and wagon roads in the Territories and built railroads during the war. They have aided States and corporations in building canals and railroads, and vast subsidies have been given for that purpose. But the Government has not hitherto entered upon the business of building itself, and operating itself, works of the kind contemplated in this resolution. Under compacts with the people of the Western States it undertook early in this century to build a road from tide-water to the Mississippi River, but after a few years sickened of the enterprise and abandoned it and turned the unfinished road over to the States. It remains to be demonstrated, as I think, whether the Government of the United States can efficiently and economically build and operate railroads and canals. While, therefore, I shall vote the money necessary for these surveys, I do not commit myself to this scheme of the committee, some parts of which I must say with all due deference seem to me to be visionary and altogether too expensive, having reference to our present ability, our enormous public debt, and the present financial outlook.

In embarking upon an extensive scheme of improvements to facilitate internal commerce, we should not ignore the lessons of experience. Half a century ago artificial water-routes were the fashion, but since the application of steam as a motive-power has come into common use, what canals of any magnitude have been built? Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois commenced their canal systems at a time when but a single railroad of twenty-three miles in length existed in the United States. This was in 1830. In 1840 there were near 3,000 miles of railway in operation; in 1850, 9,000; in 1860, 30,000; in 1872, 70,178 miles, being in length one-half of all the railways on the globe, and costing more than $30,000,000,000. If we except those built in the West and South since 1850, which received Government aid in lands and bonds, this vast railway system, which has no parallel in the oldest and wealthiest parts of the world, has been achieved by private enterprise and in the space of a little more than forty years; and yet there be those who think, notwithstanding what has been done by the enterprise of citizens banded together in corporations, we have not gone fast enough, and the Government must enter the field in order to multiply the facilities for transportation, and expend millions upon millions more in the same direction. Hitherto it has been found, I think, to be generally true that wherever existing lines were insufficient to transact the business of the country, or were earning profits upon their capital in excess of other forms of investment, new lines have sprung up to meet the wants of the community and divide the profits. What has been the effect of this multiplication of railroads? They have afforded a facility that was not enjoyed before. Their construction has been hailed by the universal acclaim of the sections of country through which they were built. Villages and cities have sprung up along their lines and at their terminations. Real estate has been greatly enhanced in value, and immigration attracted. With all their discriminations and exactions, there is not an existing railway which the people, living on the belt it traverses, would consent to give up, not one. Let but a new enterprise of the kind be started and the whole country it is to traverse is alive with excitement, and its benefits are at once discounted in the enhancement of real estate. And moreover, sir, there is one consideration not to be lost sight of in the impartial consideration of this question, that no one is bound either to travel or transport his property upon a railway if he prefer the old methods. There is no compulsion to use them, and the old roads still remain.

When I consider the many and palpable benefits which railways have conferred in opening the Western States and Territories to settlement and cultivation and in rendering the mining regions accessible, I cannot condemn unqualifiedly the policy of Congress in the aid it has extended—extravagantly sometimes, I grant, but on the whole beneficially. What an empire lies west of the Mississippi River to-day! Had Missouri and Kansas, Nebraska and Minnesota, to say nothing of the Territories, been left to settle up as Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan were settled, think you they would have teemed with their present millions of population and wealth? No, sir; the prairies of Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas would have remained barren wastes to-day, inaccessible to the immigrant, had not railways opened their virgin soils to settlement and cultivation. In my own State an arm of the grand prairie of Illinois penetrates to within a short distance of the Wabash River. It is within my memory when farming lands worth now fifty dollars per acre, lands unrivaled in fertility and beauty of location, within less than a day's drive of the river, remained Government lands subject to private entry for years. But this was before the day of railroads there. It is not a popular truth to be told, but not the less the truth, that men complain most of the exactions of railroads who have been most benefited by them, and who would be set back 50 per cent. in the value of their property if the rails were to be taken up and the road disused.

The Committee on Transportation urge the improvement of these routes both because they are needed to move the productions of the country and the influence they will exert in cheapening transportation. In other words, the argument is, first, that notwithstanding the natural highways of the country, our lakes and rivers, notwithstanding the existing canals in the States and Canada—notwithstanding the seventy thousand miles of railway—we want more lines of communication with the sea-ports on the Atlantic and the Gulf in order to transport the surplus products of the West, the Northwest, and Southwest to the sea-side; and second, that we need these principally to reduce the present cost of railway carriage.

A word or two, sir, on both these heads. Let us compare our means of intercommunication with those of other countries older and wealthier, and see how the account stands; and I begin with England. I know there is a great difference in the topography and extent of the two countries, and allowance should be made for that in the comparison. The principal rivers of England and Wales are the Severn, the Mersey, the Thames, Humber, Ouse, and Trent, all of them tide-water rivers; but their united length is less than that of the Ohio, while the entire distance of tide-water in all of them is only three hundred miles. Through all the appliances of slack-water navigation there are but four hundred miles of steam navigation on all these streams.

Of railways open and operated at the end of the year 1872, there belonged to England and Wales 11,136 miles; to Scotland, 2,587 miles, and to Ireland 2,091 miles. That is to say, in Great Britain and Ireland, containing a population within one-fourth part of our own and double or treble our wealth, the railways opened and operated are 15,814 miles in length—less than one-fourth of the railways built and operated in this country.

British India is a vast country, and ever since 1853 the British government has pursued the policy of promoting internal trade and commerce by aiding in the construction of railways. The census taken in 1872 showed that British India contained a population numbering a little more than 191,000,000, living on an area of 950,919 English square miles, showing an average of 201 inhabitants to the square mile. Its revenues amount to $250,000,000 annually, and its trade and commerce, its exports and imports, to nearly one-half our own. Well, sir, the total miles of railways opened and operated in British India on April 1, 1873, was only 5,467 miles. As far back as 1845 two great private associations were formed for the purpose of constructing railway lines in India, but found it impossible to prosecute their schemes without aid from the state. The Indian government came to the rescue, and agreed to guarantee to the railway companies for a term of ninety-nine years a rate of interest of 5 per cent. upon the capital subscribed for their undertakings. Since 1869 the government of India has carried on all the new railway extensions by means of direct state agency; that is to say, without the intervention of guaranteed companies. By the old plan the companies constructing the roads could surrender them and receive from the government the money expended; and on the other hand the government could, at the expiration of twenty-five or fifty years from the date of the contracts, purchase the railways at the mean value of the shares for the three previous years.

France has a large system of canals, mainly constructed at the public expense, only about one-fifth being constructed by concessioned companies.

In 1872 she had 5,037 kilometers of canals and 8,060 kilometers of navigable rivers. Thirteen and one-half million pounds have been spent in that empire in deepening the beds of rivers as well as widening and straightening their courses. The total length of railways opened in France is 17,240 kilometers.

I beg leave to refer to one more foreign country in this connection. The Russian Empire comprises one-seventh of the territorial part of the globe; and during the present century the internal commerce as well as the foreign trade of this great country has been greatly extended by a comprehensive net-work of railways. Yet on the 1st of September, 1873, the total length of all her railroads was less than ten thousand English miles—less than the seventh part of our own railway system.

I have instituted these comparisons, Mr. President, between our own and foreign countries for the single purpose of showing that during the last half-century the United States, less than a century old as a nation, have outstripped them all in providing facilities for internal commerce and for reaching the sea-board, whence our surplus products are carried to foreign markets. I have not time to go into the particulars of our artificial water-routes. I may mention one only which passes my own door, a canal nearly four hundred miles in length, the longest, I believe, in the world, which as originally constructed connected the Ohio River, at the city of Evansville, with Lake Erie at Toledo, more than one-third of which is now abandoned and the remainder preserves a sickly existence. Our experience has demonstrated that in the main canals are failures. For one-half of the year they are closed by frost. Floods burst their banks. The expense of keeping them in repair is great. They admit but a limited amount of tonnage, and transit on them is slow. They have only proved profitable where they were trunk lines, fed by numerous commercial tributaries, like the Erie Canal. The fact that since the railroad era scarcely a new one has been undertaken is proof that the popular judgment is opposed to this form of commercial facility. Pennsylvania and Indiana have long since surrendered the control of theirs to corporations.

But the committee suppose they have found an answer to all objections against canals in the history of the Erie Canal. That work, they say, has more than paid the cost of its construction and enlargement. That may be so. I take no issue with them. But it is to be considered that this great improvement was projected in 1811 and completed in 1825; that it connects the chain of the upper lakes with tide-water on the Hudson; that before railroads were thought of it was the only means by which the productions of the State of New York and all the country lying west of it could reach the sea; and that three other great pioneer canal enterprises undertaken about the same time and leading to tide-water, but which were not, like the Erie Canal, short links between navigable waters, have never yet been completed. I refer to the Pennsylvania Canal, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and the James River and Kanawha Canal. It is this last-named canal which the committee propose in their report to take up after the lapse of half a century and complete at an expense of not less than $48,000,000, some estimates placing it as high as sixty millions even, and in carrying out the scheme to conduct the canal by a tunnel for seven miles through a mountain range. It is this route and the other one south of it the committee propose the General Government shall take in hand which especially challenge my criticism. I refer to the improvement of the Tennessee River up to Knoxville and the construction of a canal or railway thence to Savannah.

While the committee press these schemes upon Congress, I do not forget, sir, the surveys which have been made across the Isthmus of Darien under the auspices of the Government, looking to the opening of a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. It was but a few days since that the new envoy from Nicaragua in presenting his credentials to the President said nothing could be more gratifying to his country than the initiation taken by the United States in this gigantic project. Warming with the subject, he said:

> The energy of this great nation, its immense resources, its essentially enterprising characters and its ardent enthusiasm for all that is great, furnish a sure guarantee that the interoceanic canal, which has been regarded as a chimera by past generations, will become a brilliant reality whenever this nation shall lend its powerful aid.

And the President is reported as saying in reply:

> The people of the United States are deeply interested in the prosperity of the American republics, and will see with pleasure the completion of any work which may promote it; especially will they regard with satisfaction the construction of ship-canals between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, wherever it may be found possible to construct them to advantage.

You see, Mr. President, that the brilliant scheme of the committee, which looks to the expenditure of one hundred and fifty-five millions only within the period of six years, is not the only one to tax the national revenues.

And those revenues, sir, what of their condition? We are cutting down our appropriations in every direction to keep the Treasury from becoming bankrupt. Work upon the newly-authorized public buildings is to be stopped, the customary appropriations to the improvement of rivers and harbors are to be curtailed, compensation to Government employés lowered, the Army is to be cut down, retrenchment here and there is to be made, to save the people from new forms of taxation. And then, sir, dark and lowering clouds hover over the nation. We have ceased payments upon the national debt. For a year past it has been diminished less than $3,000,000, and the Treasury statement of the first of this month shows the debt yet remaining to be $2,145,000,000. The manufacturing industries of the country have been brought to a stand-still. The people of the country are greatly in debt, more so, I think, than at any former period of our history, unless I except the year 1857, and there is a fearful looking forward everywhere to what the morrow will bring forth.

I desire at this point to read an article from a paper published in the greatest manufacturing city in this country. The article was penned less than a week since. It presents very forcibly the actual condition of our manufacturing interests at this time. "Will Congress take heed." That is the heading.

> Half a million of skilled and unskilled workingmen in this country are out of employment to-day because there is no work for them to do.

I hope my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Transportation, will listen to what I am reading. It is an instructive lesson, I think, on the subject of the vast expenditures which that committee propose.

> Nearly two hundred thousand of these idle workingmen are iron-workers, coal and ore miners, and other mechanics and laborers whose dependence for daily bread is upon the prosperity of the iron trade. Of the remaining three hundred thousand many have been workers in cotton and woolen factories; many have been railway employés; others are carpenters, shoemakers, masons, bricklayers, plasterers, painters, clerks, &c. We are in the ninth month of the panic, and the last month presents a tenfold more dreary prospect of relief than did the first. Southern planters and western farmers share in the general prostration of business. What has Congress done to mitigate the effects of this panic upon the unemployed workingmen we have enumerated?

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator calls my attention particularly to that. I desire to say that I want no stronger argument in favor of doing something by the Government to build up its prosperity and set these men to work. Instead of calling this Government bankrupt and saying, "We will close our doors and shut up the concern," let us have courage to go ahead and the country will be prosperous again.

Mr. PRATT. Does my friend contemplate that the various mechanics which are enumerated here, the carpenters, the shoemakers, the masons, the bricklayers, the plasterers, the painters, clerks, &c., are going to drift into the service of these gigantic schemes which the committee propose, that they are going to receive employment in the building of these canals?

Mr. WINDOM. I presume the clerks and some others would not; but you would give employment to vast bodies of idle people now in this country. Make the farmers prosperous, the manufacturers of the East prosperous, the cotton-planters of the South prosperous, and then others will be supplied with work and food.

Mr. PRATT. I will proceed with the article; I do not wish to read much more.

> What has Congress done to mitigate the effects of this panic upon the unemployed workingmen we have enumerated? What has it done to provide them with employment through a revival of those industries which the panic prostrated? Thus far—through wearisome December, January, February, March, April, May, and into June—nothing!

And now, sir, at this time of stagnation of business, of paralysis of industries, of general prostration, we are told by the Executive that "it is a high and plain duty to return to a specie basis at the earliest practicable day." Nay, more; the country is advised by the President that the legal-tender clause should be repealed by the 1st of July, 1875—less than thirteen months hence—so that after that day no debtor can discharge his debt except by coin, and that these legal-tender notes themselves, the pet money of the people, should be paid off if we have to borrow gold for the purpose, by the 1st of July, 1876, and forever retired from circulation; and this currency, which carried us triumphantly through the war and since the war has been the beneficent agent which promoted so largely the prosperity of the people, which enabled them in four years of General Grant's administration to pay off four hundred millions of the national debt, shall exist only as a bright dream of the past.

But what, sir, of the $1,500,000,000 which the nation, the States, corporations, and individuals owe abroad? What of the untold indebtedness which our people owe one to another, if specie payments are to be precipitated like a blighting frost upon the country? How, think you, sir, the poor debtor will relish the taunt—

> It must be borne in mind, too, that the creditor interest had its day of disadvantage also, when our present financial system was brought in by the supreme needs of the nation at the time.

I know it was not meant to be a taunt by the President, but it will sound so to the debtor, and will ring in his ears like a death-knell.

Now, sir, with this clouded future before us, is this a time to enter upon enterprises which will require fresh taxation upon our already overburdened people? No, sir; we can afford to wait until the skies clear up. I do not object to the surveys; let them be made. I do not object to the improvement of our national highways; let that good work go on as heretofore. The Mississippi River, that noble highway between the northern lakes and the Gulf, eminently demands liberal outlays, just as soon as we can afford to make them. I would be glad to see Congress charter a corporation to build a great trunk freigth-railway, with four tracks, from the Atlantic to some point West, with branches to Chicago and Saint Louis, fixing the maximum rates of transportation and having a voice in its government and guaranteeing a certain rate of interest upon the investment to its stockholders, or aiding the company by its credit; which road should act as a regulator of transportation rates upon other competing routes. I would be willing, if the thing were practicable, that a commission should be organized which should regulate freight charges upon such railways as by combinations have become continuous lines to the seaboard. I have no doubt myself about the power of Congress to do this under that large delegation of power in the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States. I think the committee in their report have abundantly established the existence of that power. And, sir, if I have caught the tone of popular sentiment aright, the great agricultural West will be satisfied at present with the adoption of either one of these methods.

Mr. President, I started out to argue two propositions and have argued neither in a logical way; and I have gone too far to retrace my steps. What I aimed to show was that the committee have not met the present and pressing wants of the people in the splendid plan they suggest. The time may come when that plan will be practicable, nay necessary, in all its parts. But we must double our population, and double or triple our wealth and get out of debt before we can afford to enter upon it.

There is a great future in store for us if we do not mar our fortunes by unwise legislation. What man's judgment is to his individual action, in making it wise and beneficent or otherwise, the judgment of Congress, representing the national will, is to the progress of the nation. The formation of this nation began two hundred and fifty years ago upon Plymouth Rock and the banks of James River. Year by year it has steadily grown in numbers, in wealth, in intelligence, now and then expanding its boundaries as opportunity offered, until it has attained the rank of a first-class power among the nations. What people have outstripped us in material development during these two and a half centuries? Not one. Let us be content to pursue the ancient ways; content to be governed in the present by the same prudent maxims that have hitherto governed us and which govern all prudent business men. Does the man of business, when deeply embarrassed by debt, embark in new enterprises, requiring large outlays of money which he has not got to spare? Are such enterprises undertaken at all when the times are out of joint, when the industries of the country are in an unsettled condition, when men gaze in each other's faces with distrust, and money retreats to its hiding-places? No, sir; great enterprises are entered upon only in seasons of peace, of confidence, and prosperity. And what is true of the individual is true of the nation, or at least should be. Now, I fail to see any satisfactory evidence of a public sentiment requiring Congress at this time to set on foot any such costly scheme as that recommended by the committee, which instead of completion in six years will require double that number to complete. There is a wide-spread dissatisfaction, I grant, at what the people think are excessive rates on the part of railroads and at unjust and oppressive discriminations. They want these rates moderated and these discriminations abolished, and they want these two things accomplished by direct legislation by Congress against the railroad corporations if it shall be found to be constitutional and practicable. But if, on the other hand, for any reason this is found to be impracticable, then what the people want is that Congress shall either charter a company to build, or the Government itself shall build, a great central freight-railway, such as I have described, with the power reserved in Congress to establish from time to time what shall be the maximum rates charged for freights. With such a measure of relief and the improvement of the Mississippi River, especially at its mouth, the people would be content for the present.

Mr. CONOVER. I have submitted an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which I request may be read, as it is on the Clerk's desk.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

For surveys to ascertain the most eligible line in which a canal across the Isthmus of Florida can be constructed, and whether safe land-locked navigation between the waters of the Mississippi and the Gulf, along the coasts of Alabama, Louisiana, and Florida, and through the latter State to the Atlantic coast, can be had, to estimate the probable cost and practicability of construction of such works and of any artificial water-routes found necessary to provide a safe inland navigation between the Mississippi River and one of the sea-ports on the east coast of Florida, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CONOVER. Mr. President, in submitting this amendment——

Mr. WEST. I rise to inquire whether the Senator can interpose business of that kind when a resolution of a different kind is pending?

Mr. CONOVER. It is not of a different character. I wish to submit some remarks which are appropriate to this amendment and also to the resolution that is now under consideration. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit my views on that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is not offered for adoption at this time, but was read for information.

Mr. WEST. Very well.

[Mr. CONOVER addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate is so thin this evening that I suggest that by unanimous consent after the morning hour to-morrow the vote shall be taken without further debate on this resolution.

Mr. WEST. We can vote now.

Mr. WINDOM. We may as well vote now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I see Senators are coming in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERTSON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana. [Mr. MORTON.] If he were here he would vote for the resolution, and I should vote against it.

Mr. WINDOM, (when the name of Mr. SCHURZ was called.) The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] was compelled to leave the Senate on account of illness, and he desired me to say that if he were here he would vote for the resolution, not committing himself, however, to anything but the natural water-routes.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 43, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Tipton, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cooper, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Merrimon, and Saulsbury—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—24.

So the resolution was agreed to.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following report:

The commitee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House agree to the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill, and agree to the second amendment with an amendment, namely: Strike out of said second amendment the word "fifteen," and in lieu thereof insert the word "sixty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

T. J. ROBERTSON,
D. D. PRATT,
T. M. NORWOOD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
W. S. HERNDON,
N. B. BRADLEY,
J. ORR,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

QUARTERMASTER'S CORPS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army, asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN COBURN of Indiana, Mr. CHARLES ALBRIGHT of Pennsylvania, and Mr. J. W. NESMITH of Oregon, managers at the same on on its part.

Mr. WEST. In the absence of the chairman of the Military Committee I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commissions of certain officers of the Army, and grant the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the PRESIDENT pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. SPENCER, WEST, and RANSOM were appointed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ALCORN, from the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works for rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his secretary, announced that the bill (S. No. 249) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes,
